LITTELL'S LIVING AGE

1893.

In 1893 will enter its YEAR OF JUBILEE, hence a retrospective glance at its history may be now appropriately taken.

In establishing this magazine its founder sought to present in convenient form a history of the world's progress, by selecting from the whole wide field of European Periodical Literature, the best articles by the most eminent writers in every department, Biography, History, Literature, Travels, Science, Politics, Art, Criticism, in a word, "de omnibus rebus," including Fiction and Poetry.

The plan thus originally proposed has been faithfully followed during the forty-nine years of its existence, with what measure of success the uniformly high character of the articles presented to its readers for 2530 Consecutive Weeks and the contents of its 195 Octavo Volumes sufficiently attest.

A.D. 1844. "I have never seen any similar publication of equal merit." — GEORGE TICKNOR, August, 1844.

A.D. 1869. "Still as fresh, as racy, as enchanting, and full to the brim of scientific value, as when it rejoiced in its first year." — ALFRED D. STREET, in Albany Evening Journal, Nov., 1869.

A.D. 1892. "Only the best has ever filled its pages: the best thought, rendered in the purest English. Nothing poor or unworthy has ever appeared in the columns of The Living Age." — THE PRESBYTERIAN, Philadelphia, 13th April, 1892.

In the coming year THE LIVING AGE will continue to be

THE REFLEX OF THE AGE IN WHICH IT LIVES.

Fiction will still occupy its accustomed place in the magazine and the exquisite short stories which appear in every number and which have been so well received during the past year will remain a prominent feature of this department.

OBSERVE! THE LIVING AGE is a Weekly Magazine of sixty-four pages, giving more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double column octavo pages of reading matter yearly, forming four large volumes, thus presenting a mass of matter Unequalled in Quality and Quantity by any other publication in the country.

The Boston TRANSCRIPT of Sept. 3, 1892, says of THE LIVING AGE: "No well-ordered and intelligent household should be without this publication."

That every such household may be induced to subscribe for the magazine, extend its sphere of usefulness and double its circulation, the publishers make the following

METHODIST REVIEW.

JANUARY, 1893.

ART. I.—WHITHER?—A STUDY OF TENDENCY.

THE views presented in this article are the result of much reflection and of fair opportunities of observation before I was called to my present work. The wider travel and experience of a quadrennium in the general superintendency of the Methodist Episcopal Church have confirmed them, and made me the more ready to give them expression. Nevertheless, I am not in the least speaking for my colleagues, nor phrasing any consensus of episcopal opinion. I know not if any one of the bishops would agree with me.

It is my belief that all the denominations, imported or original, on American soil, are surely undergoing transformation and assimilation, and that those which are incapable of either have no long or valuable life.

One of the compelling forces is the influence of our free institutions in encouraging and facilitating the business, social, and philanthropic intercourse of believers of diverse faiths. Opportunities are not few when the Roman hierarchy, for instance, must make concessions to the national importance of the representatives of those great Protestant Churches, of which their most kindly description is found in Cardinal Gibbon's designation, "Our separated brethren." Thus at the recent celebration of the opening of the Columbian Exposition one Cardinal and an Archbishop of the Roman obedience spoke, while a bishop of our own Church offered the prayer. Such a fact could hardly be visible in any country possessing a religious establishment.

The absence of privileged classes in our social order is another assimilative force. Families may be old, Churches may be venerable, but before the law all are equal. This fact tends to produce a considerate and broad way of looking at the rights of others hardly possible in a land where exclusive privilege fosters and dignifies social isolation. The temper of mind which can decline public national function through fear of the recognition of the sects, leads a starveling life where religion is free. One can with difficulty lift his imagination to the plane where, in England or on the Continent, it would be possible for the prelates of the National Church to condescend to participate in such a scene as the opening exercises at Chicago.

The high Christian character and manifest presence of the Spirit in all denominations of believers have compelled recognition among those who are unable to reconcile their exclusive theories with the facts. A chance acquaintance of scientific training and candor, himself a communicant of a Church which could not recognize me as a minister, and closely related to one of its bishops, once said to me:

> According to my belief I ought to find more and better developed fruits of the Spirit and larger success in moral leadership in the ministry and laity of my own Church. We claim apostolic authority and real presence. But plainly, I see no more, to say the least, Christliness of life and apostolic devotion in my own Church than in yours. On my theory I cannot account for this. I therefore begin to fear that I have not even a presumably true working hypothesis, much less the real truth on this point. As a scientific man, accustomed to induction from facts, my scientific faith as to the churchly character of all believers outruns my historical limitations.

It is this which, in my mind, more than anything else, accounts for the concessions first proposed by the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops, and adopted and promulgated afterward by the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Church of England is no longer the exclusive Church of the English people. "Churchmen" are very unwilling to permit a religious census of England to be taken, lest this painful fact should have larger visibility and advertisement. But when the denominational statistics are compared with the political census, the truth appears that one half of England is "sectarian," leaving possibly a lesser "half" to the "Church."

It would require a greater blindness to facts than that which ordinarily limits the Churchly vision, to maintain in such a presence that the notes of a true Church were only to be seen in the Establishment. Nor must the influence of a great group of historians, all, I believe, recently dead, but all very much alive in English religious thought, be underestimated. Stanley, Lightfoot, Hatch, and the living Farrar have injected the ferment of a broader Churchmanship into the English mind; and, apart from the influence of Canon Liddon, who was far more of a preacher than an historian, no recent weighty judgment, other than from some of the cathedras of the great bishoprics, holds the tide of brotherhood in check. While in this country the numerical significance of Anglicanism as expressed by the Protestant Episcopal Church is not great, its social power and historical and actual preeminence in New York city make it, in the line indicated, a worthy object of study. While the old Low Churchman can hardly be found with a microscope out of Virginia or Maryland—while some of the recent legislation of that Church has looked to greater exclusiveness, as notably in the result of the Boggs and Stubbs attack on the younger Tyng—while it has always reflected English tendency a generation late—yet, much to the disgust of the Seymours and Graftons, breadth is surely displacing narrowness. That Phillips Brooks should have been confirmed as a bishop of that Church is ample proof that the confirming authority recognized, unwillingly, it may be, the great strength of the broader fellowship existing in that Church despite the canons, and dared not resist it. It may be that it requires a lifetime in the atmosphere of that Church to comprehend its spirit. But though near enough to it in family relationship to look over the fence which they have built between us, and to recognize the flavor of the food on which it grows, I have never been able to understand how Bishop Potter of New York, whom all men honor for learning, pulpit power, high character, and all the qualities of leadership, could say, as he did, at the consecration of Bishop Brooks, "there is room in the Church for both theories"—that is, for both historical and non-historical apostolic succession. There is small room in nature for contradictions in truth.

Turning now to the Presbyterian Churches, the movement therein is certainly toward breadth. Never having denied the Christian character of non-Presbyterian believers, it has had little to learn in that direction. So far as it has been exclusive it has been so from a love and reverence for what it believed to be truth. It has been the mission of the Presbyterian Church in every land to uphold the sovereignty of God. From that premise it has deduced all that rockribbed and ironbound theology which has oppressed her conscience and fettered her heart. In every land and under every name she resented the Arminian scheme of doctrine as unworthy the sovereign majesty of the Most High. "God wills it," has been her cry, as it was of the Crusaders. Yet notwithstanding the utter failure of any man to break Calvin's logical chain, the world turns from his creed, first in aversion and then in terror, that so incredible a God could have ever commanded the love or reverence of holy men. No unsophisticated mind, no keen sense of honor, no fine sense of justice, could ever have held a race responsible for what it could not help, or thought it honored God by holding that he elected some to be saved and left others to be damned of his own good will or pleasure, "to show his wrath and make his power known." No one other than one limited by tremendous domestic and ecclesiastical pressure, and utterly without knowledge of devoutness and sincerity among all nations, and blinded to many passages of Scripture, could ever have turned the whole heathen world into hell or believed in the damnation of infants. It is, as the shadows of the years fall on me, one of the most pathetic pictures of my own memory that I can recall my white-haired grandmother weeping silent tears which sorely puzzled my boyish sympathy, and which found explanation only by much entreaty; "I am weeping because I do not know whether my two boy babies who died are saved or not!"

Nowhere, except in the South, where provincial immobility has affected theological thought, can one hear the old Calvinism defended. The controversy in New York is only a part of the evidence of unrest. The revision of the creed has stopped halfway, but only as a temporary halting-place to get breath for further revision. Irrevocably one half our Presbyterian brethren have crossed the boundary which has so long separated them from us, and the next half, knowing they must come, but delay the plunge, it may be, in the interest of peace.

It is the habit of certain New England minds, long secure in the literary and educational leadership of the country, to hail as new discoveries that which, however old, they themselves perceive for the first time. The present bigotry of the New England mind, if it exists at all, is not the bigotry of persecution, but the bigotry of indifference. This indifference is not felt toward the rationalistic teachers of Germany, nor the scholarship of England, but toward ideas which do not reach them through the prescribed channels of New England information. These must be, first, the German schools, then the English exegetes, then the theological seminaries of Yale and Andover, then the more "advanced" Presbyterian scholars of America. Last of all are they able to recognize the existence of theological truth in what they unite with our Protestant Episcopal brethren in calling the non-historical Churches. Those familiar with German teaching find only an echo of continental learning in the recent publications of the new theologians of the Congregational Church. The echo takes tone from the atmosphere in which it is heard, but the voice which originates it has the German burr. I fear, judging by the utterances of my old acquaintance, President Northrop, of the University of Minnesota, and of Dr. Dale, in the English Congregational Council, that our brethren of that order have reached in another way, and for their own body, that conviction of superiority consoling to all "churchmen," that the Congregational system and atmosphere are not adapted to the common people. They are for the thinkers and the scholarly. I recall but one Congregational writer of eminence who seems to know that statements of doctrine existed in another communion which form the only defensible phrasing of orthodox Protestant Christianity. Professor Phelps, long gone to his reward, did see that the theology of Methodism was the Protestant theological bulwark of the future. Long in close proximity to some of the great literary, educational, and theological centers of the Congregational Church, in frequent attendance upon her councils and installations, possessing some well-beloved friends in her ministry, and meeting in general clerical associations with some of her most eminent teachers, from Horace Bushnell to T. T. Munger and Newman Smythe, nothing has been the source of such perennial surprise as the éclat of novelty given to views and methods in these places and by this school which were as old as my memory of life and of my father. I could never understand this until I perceived the habit of mind noted above. That no good thing can come, theologically or intellectually, out of Methodism, is a semiconscious but dominant axiom. Of the mighty controversies of Toplady and Fletcher, of Wesley and the army which beset him, I have found them mostly uninformed, or, if informed, as one might be of a fact whose significance was of curious rather than important interest. Yet who among us does not know that there is hardly a truth or semitruth advanced in new theology but may be found defined, located, and adjusted a hundred years since by Fletcher, and especially by Wesley. Just as our Protestant Episcopal brethren are ignorant of the fact that Wesley's Prayer Book for the People called Methodists anticipated nearly all their amendments and enrichments; just as his Testament prophecies the Revised Version; just as Dean Stanley, by reason of the churchly atmosphere in which he lived, did not know, until Bishop Simpson proved it in the pulpit of St. Paul's, that the Methodist Episcopal Church more nearly represents the mind of John Wesley as respects church organization than that of the Wesleyans in England, organized as they were under the legal predominance of the Establishment; so our Congregational brethren seem not to know that Methodism avoids the necessity of a second probation and a new theodicy by teaching that it is impossible for God to permit a man to suffer hereafter from an inadequate or unjust probation. Beginning with the premise that the Judge of all the earth must do right—that the only limitations of the Holy One are in the necessities of his own perfection of love and justice—Methodism has believed, sung, and preached the Gospel to all men as the gift of the Father of all men, and in the faith that when the Holy Spirit, given to all men, enabled souls to apprehend the essential Christ, the Just One would not condemn them for providential ignorance of the historical Messiah.

It is evident, however, in several States that the Churches perceive our truth and value its expositors. Few of our ministers in New England who have education and firm position among us have been without opportunity to enter their ministry. A goodly number have accepted calls and are doing well in their new fields. Teaching power depends on certainty. Methodists have always had and still have something definite to teach. The doctrinal steadiness of Methodism is a marvel to those who do not know its cause. Ascribed to the lack of education in our ministry, it has a widely different source. Men of the broadest opportunities, who do not surrender all distinctively Christian belief and become Unitarians, find it impossible to express their faith in more satisfactory terms than those of our fathers. Their feeling is, that if the supernatural element is to remain, this is the most rational expression of a supernatural and divine redemption in its extent, quality, and effect. To change this is to abandon faith; and as the spirit of our Church is to keep men in close contact with souls, they find the doctrine verified by experience of its power. Hence, with nothing to omit, defend, or explain away, they imperturbably yet sympathetically observe the movement about them. What I wish, however, for the purposes of this paper to emphasize is, that doctrinal unity is near at hand in respect of the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist Churches. Our ministers and people who have gone find themselves at home, because no change of faith is asked for either in pulpit or pew.

With the exception of sacramental grace we are one in doctrine with the Protestant Episcopal Church, however widely separated in clientage and spirit. The divisive line is only, doctrinally, in apostolic succession and its corollaries. Let us interpret "the historical episcopate locally adapted," and there is no barrier of doctrine or practice which need keep us apart a year. All the rest is ritual, within the liberty of the individual church or teaching, not settled or defined by authority. Yet a whole wide world separates us if, by the historical episcopate, that Judaistic survival under another form of bishop and priest in tactual succession from the apostles is meant. Maintaining the ancient office and the ancient orders, the ancient nomenclature and the ancient ritual, we hold out a brother's hand to The Churchman and The Independent alike. The ancient things are dear and venerable, but not of the essence of faith nor of the primal deposit of truth.

There is less visible sign in America of coming unity with other Christians on the part of the Baptists than of any of the other great religious bodies. Possessing but one raison d'etre they must emphasize it, or their candlestick is removed. It is surely an interesting study to inquire as to the closer communion and greater segregation of the Baptist Churches from other Christians in America than in England. How has it happened that the Strict has stamped his views on American Baptist life more than the Open? Separated from the Congregationalists only by immersion, or, as they prefer to call it, believer's baptism and close communion, they lead a life of isolation only surpassed among Protestants by the Protestant Episcopal Church; yet they have not escaped the wave of fraternal feeling nor the yearning after unity. The departure of several of their more eminent ministers to communions where immersion has less emphasis—their participation in union revival services—their intercourse with other Churches through the societies of Christian Endeavor and the like, are signs that the solvent of denominational fixedness is already at work among them.

Turning now to influences which have affected all Churches, I note as among the most prominent the fact indicated by Providence as beyond doubt, that strong Churches shall grow up not about strong systems but about strong men. Not even the Roman communion can escape this. The irremovable rector has become a power even in a Roman diocese. We see Roman congregations resisting the removal from his altar of a strong and welcome priest even though the power of his diocesan is beyond question. Presbyterianism is strongest in New York around Dr. Hall, Dr. Parkhurst, and Dr. Paxton. It is doubtful if presbyteries, synods, and general assemblies could sever these ties if they tried. So in the Protestant Episcopal Church, apart from Trinity Parish in New York, where the influence of colonial endowments is overwhelming, strong churches grow around strong men, as, for example, the stronger St. Thomas's and St. George's of to-day. While William M. Taylor was himself, the Broadway Tabernacle was a fountain of pure teaching and manly Christianity. Dr. McArthur furnishes a stronghold for the Baptist faith by being himself strong. Dr. Storrs, in the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, well renews at seventy the strength of his church, though years have left him few of his early lay coadjutors. The unique personality and gifts of Dr. Talmage keep about him a magnetized but not hypnotized multitude. Dr. Abbott, in Plymouth pulpit, gathers his own clientage, but the congregation shows the loss of Mr. Beecher. It is so in every city.

The man, and not the system, is master. Phillips Brooks was greater than his church in Trinity, Boston. Dearly loving and highly honoring our own Methodist Episcopal Church, ought we not to ask, in view of these facts, whether much of our tenuity in the great cities is not due to the rapidly fading remnant of an itineracy of which we have had little, practically, since the abandonment of the old circuit system? Have we not sacrificed the man to the system, and so have we not been fighting against the providence of God?

I note, secondly, the manifest tendency toward a greater participation on the part of the people in the exercise of public worship. Against all protests, fears, and hysterics the ritual in some form has come to stay. In our own, in every non-ritualistic Church, the opportunities of participation in the service have multiplied until we have reached here and there the other extreme, and have made a good, strong sermon almost impossible, except one has a Niagara current of forceful speech. Responsive readings, chants, trisagions, processionals are abundantly known in Methodist and other Churches. There is a distinct tendency toward unity in and around the Anglican prayer book. This tendency, which is observed with delight by all Anglicans, does not mean all they think. If it means more consideration for a liturgy and for liturgical Churches it means also less preeminence for them in liturgical particulars, and less resort to them for release from the crudities of extemporaneous worship. The preacher who reaches the masses must paint pictures. The scenic and the formal have a certain place in public worship. It was our own theologian, Richard Watson, who maintained that the best service is a mixed service, combining freedom and liturgy. Accustomed to a ritual for all the special services of the Church, and having various rituals in many Churches, developed from the fancy and ingenuity of pastors and Sunday school superintendents, often bringing Scripture to interpretations unnatural and strange by inapt and hurried hands, it is no wonder that some, even in our own communion, begin to ask whether liberty shall not be given to churches who prefer it to use the prayer book of the days of Asbury.

Whatever opinion may be held concerning the permanent value of Mr. Moody's work, or of the truth of the pre-millennial theories believed to be the inspiration of his later career, it cannot be doubted that he has done more to bring the Churches into cooperative and fraternal relations than any other living man. Requiring in his earlier career the help of all ministers, the contributions of all to his tabernacles and choirs, he furnished a common meeting-ground, a highly illustrative example of the value of lay labor, a convincing and fascinating proof of the power of the chorus in song and of the refrain in hymns, and a hymnary and psalmody so catching that it has become a universal liturgy. If I mistake not I have heard Moody and Sankey's hymns during mid-day mission services in Trinity Church, New York! and I have surely heard "Hold the Fort" in Japan, Corea, and China. The value of the refrain and of lay labor and of personal contact with the inquirer were no new revelations to Methodists. We have probably been less benefited by his labors on this account than any other considerable Church. But the fact remains, that the praise services of all denominations spring from this liturgy of his installation, and that greater interdenominational sympathy has resulted.

Again I call attention to the fact that revival methods, long the despised possession of Methodists chiefly, have in various forms penetrated and possessed all communions, even the most sacerdotal. Whether called missions, revival or evangelistic services, the aim is the same—to stir the believer to renewed consecration and the impenitent to penitence and faith. Adapted to the genius of each Church, they are now permanent parts of all ecclesiastical methods. The result has been amazing in several Churches. More than any other has the Protestant Episcopal Church benefited by the change. Not yet commanding in rural districts, she even there shows the true missionary spirit. In the large cities, however, by recognizing the fact that the largest missionary work can no longer be done by one man alone, she has multiplied men and foundations, and is rapidly becoming a leader in the field instead of a regiment in a fort. And this brings me to note that the Churches are coming to understand the larger gospel of benevolent work as an adjunct of the preaching the word, nay, as one form of preaching the word. It is not many years since practical philanthropy, as expressed in mission and hospital foundations, was rare outside the Roman Church. No fear of popery, no dread of undue imitation of Roman methods has prevented the springing up of forms of benevolence so searching, so varied, and so constant, that few forms of want or suffering are without free and prompt methods of relief. But the most astonishing change is in the setting apart of godly women, by various forms of consecration and in various protective garbs, to the ministry of the body as well as the soul, thus opening to the larger portion of the Church fitting and welcome fields of labor.

I take all these facts to be an expression of Christian unity, and a prophecy of it. When love is born bigotry dies. Rome has had a powerful argument against Protestantism in the coldness of our services and in the relegation of the duties of benevolence to secular authorities. The town poorhouse is chiefly a Protestant creation. The city hospital, in which the brutal and drunken nurse was so long a frequent figure, was never a credit to a nation of Christians. To the growing sentiment that good deeds must crown true faith as the flower crowns the leaf, and to the truth that loving sympathy with the fallen can alone lift them again, is due the Homes for the Friendless, for the Magdalen, for the Aged and Indigent, for Castaways, for all those conditions of sorrowing humanity which seem to multiply as our civilization increasingly complicates itself.

In the presence, then, of these tendencies we may see evolving the Church of the Future. That it will be wholly like any one now existing I cannot believe. Assimilation is evidently God's order. It comes from our freedom of movement, life, and competition. The most assuming must be humbled, the most independent must be organized. This must happen whether they like it or not; plan it or not. Sacerdotalism cannot permanently survive the proofs of priesthood in the individual believer. Social forces and endowments may give it vogue among the few; but the masses will first doubt it, then deny it, then, perceiving that it is the foe of unity, throttle it. The solidarity of the Church must prepare the way for the solidarity of the nations. There is no more chance for the victory of a divine right Church than there is for the universal empire of a divine right king. This last has all he can do to sit quietly on his throne, and even his simulacrum, the constitutional monarch, is yielding his seat to the majesty of the people. A more preposterous hope I know not than that which looks for Christian unity through agencies which survive only through fear of excommunication. Rome, by erecting an infallible pope, has prepared the agency by which her pretensions will yet be destroyed. I have no hope that she will ever be wholly reformed from without. The process will be this: education, contact with other Christians, the death of superstition by science, the manifest Christian character and work of her "separated brethren," the concessions made by the central authority to national Churches for the maintenance of her visible unity, nay, the Spirit of God himself, not wholly driven away or crushed out by the uninspired additions to doctrine and order, will one day develop a pope who will be the Hildebrand of reform instead of reaction, and he, unhampered by councils, which were dismissed forever by Pius IX for a vastly different reason, will ex-cathedra declare those reforms which will open the way for a reunited Christendom. We may, we must, until then do our work as the several army corps of the Lord's army; some heavily laden and strictly drilled, and others in light marching order; some in compact columns, some as free lancers; some with a rich and inherited commissary, some living on the enemy's resources; some with numerous bands and elaborate drum corps, others with only a bugle and a war cry. It is enough for to-day if we have the same aim, the same commander, and the same spirit. The first two we have already, the last one is not yet with us. A victory over another body of Christians, which is really working for Christ, though in imperfect and halting ways, is no true victory. His day is not coming through pettiness, bigotry, and greater joy over a pervert than a convert. Changes and interchanges will go on. The departure of a dissident may give greater power to those remaining who assent. The vast departure from Rome of Luther's time is stronger to-day than ever. The Protestant nations are clearly the nations of the future. The English tongue has the right of way in the coming centuries. Rome abides only as she abandons the Inquisition, accepts the science which is her lethal draught, allies herself to republics, and ceases to be the moral foundation of kings. How can she maintain the terrors and the powers of her hierarchy when the political institutions which were their inspiration die through the contempt and hate of men? The truth, the beauty, the rightly venerable, the saintly, the Christlike will abide. Her methods of work and worship, when not hindrances to the devout heart, and when helpful to morals, will endure and become part of the universal Christian heritage. That process is going on now. It is visible to all who will look. In some moods Christians will seek exaltation of mind and heart through elaborate ritual, in others their cry will be for solitude, as of the heron in the wilderness. Rome herself is seen at her best in America. She has lost the people in Italy, and the men everywhere, except that when moribund they give comfort to friends by accepting extreme unction. No processions in Columbian celebrations having more of a national than ecclesiastical character and elan can blind us to the fact that Rome cannot hold men Roman where religion and education are free. If she holds them it is by ceasing to be Roman and beginning to be Catholic. That beginning will be the beginning of the day of the Lord.

As I look over the field and seek candor and charity at the Master's feet, I rejoice that we have so little to undo, so little to abandon, so little to learn of the truth, while I mourn we are so far beneath our privilege in breadth of view and depth of Christian experience. The Methodist Episcopal Church is dear to me, not alone because she is the Church of my fathers, the Church of my toil, the Church which has honored me with her chief office. In our self-deceptions, from which we shall be free only in the white light of the eternal throne, it may be that my joy in her service and my toil for her growth spring from habit and from the complacency of honorable position. But it does not seem so as I write these words. After opening my heart to God as best I can, I say it is not so; I honor her because she has never had to change her doctrine, to conceal her teachings, or to abandon her methods. She has seen all these victories in other Protestant Churches, and they are yet moving on to conquest. She has never had to learn to give room in God's kingdom, nor sulkily to yield place to others as if unwarranted intruders. She has always had her hand of welcome out to all who love Christ. Her whole governmental fabric, though of the ancient Church in terms and in authority, rests upon Christian expediency, and could be dropped at the Master's bidding if his day could be hastened thereby. Always below her ideal in practice and in learning, she has held the banner of holiness high because the Lord commanded; and beginning her work in a university has passed her people, converted at her altars, on to her schools, her colleges and universities, and dares to plan to-day at the capital of the nation the most modern and the greatest of American schools of learning. I honor her for her sympathy with all reforms, for the certainty of her place in the crusade against strong drink, for her loyalty to our republic, her insistance that the black man may kneel at her altars and sit in her highest council if he will. I venerate her as the great American tutor in Christ's school of evangelists, I rest in the doctrinal calm of her communion, even while I expect to wear out in her exactions of labor.

But all this shall not blind me to the good and the holy in all communions, nor to the faulty in my own. With all Te Deums for Christian progress she can join, and the wail of the De Profundis is strengthened by her voice. She needs more learning, breadth, greater moral intensity, greater esprit de corps, greater steadiness and fullness of religious life, greater care in the selection of her ministry, greater provision and activity in missionary work, greater consecration of her wealth to the service of man for Christ's sake, greater willingness among her ministers to endure hardship as good soldiers. But she is brave, strong, true, and loving. God is with her, and her tendency is toward him.

There is a majestic calm in her onward march. She does not stop to plead with the stragglers from her fold, but replaces them with her revival forces without lessening her pace. She is weak only in the number of her authors, and timid in the discussion of great matters in the periodicals. Yet in Dr. Bowne of Boston she has the most eminent of living American philosophers; in Professor Winchester, the greatest American master of English literature; and in Professor Moore of Chicago, but just from Evanston, the most brilliant American mathematician. She has place, work, and honor for her loyal sons. In the Church of the future she will be a mighty factor.

Dan'l A. Goodsell

Art. II.—THE GOSPEL IN NATURE.

"And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." Such is the judgment passed by the Scripture upon the work of God's hands when completed. Not only was each thing good in itself, but the relations the different departments of nature sustained to each other were also "very good." Man, created in the moral likeness and image of his Maker, stood at the head of earthly creatures, and constituted the crowning glory of nature.

The world of matter displayed its phenomena in the physical forces and laws of the universe; the vital world, in the manifold kinds and forms of plants and animals; and the intellectual, spiritual, and moral departments of nature appeared in man. His free agency, and consequently his moral responsibility, is clearly manifest in the fact that he was placed under a law having precepts and penalties. The conspicuous and overshadowing element of man's being was his moral accountability to the supreme Governor of the world for his conduct, even for his thoughts and purposes. Not only in man's being was incorporated the moral and spiritual part of the constitution and laws of nature, but this was so related to other parts that creation as a whole formed a unit, and a disturbance in any one of the three departments affected disastrously the whole.

The expression, "very good," means finished, full, complete. Earth was, then, intended to be to man not only a place of abode and a school for intellectual development, but a sanctuary of worship. It was designed to afford not only food for his body, but a realm of ideas for his mind, and inspiration to obedience and devotion to his Maker. God was to be seen not by physical vision, but by an intellectual and moral perception of his being and attributes as manifested in the marvelous works of his hands. This is the order of nature. What could we know of the honeybee were it not for the mathematical and mechanical skill it manifests in the nectar stored in the comb it builds to receive it; or of the beaver, except we examine its subterranean chambers and the dam it builds to obstruct the flow of streams; or of a spider, were it not for the web it spins and weaves into a palace suited to its accommodation?

In these facts we see a principle and a divine arrangement which pervades all nature. It is, in fact, the Creator's method of procedure in the relation he sustains to his intelligent creatures. The works of nature, as a whole, are eminently a manifestation of infinite power and wisdom; and such intelligences as were capable of reading and interpreting them, whether angels or men, would need no other revelation. We hold that such was the clearness of man's spiritual vision when created that he could as quickly and devoutly apprehend his Creator in his works as, after the incarnation, he could see him in Christ, or as a mechanic can see his brother mechanic in the structure of an engine. The place the tree of life occupied in the ritual of the original temple of nature we may not fully comprehend, but we know it was central and effective in the primitive form of worship. It is probable that Solomon's temple on the day of its dedication, and Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, did not lend a mightier inspiration to duty and worship than did nature by such elements as were within and without men, when first "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." The difference between the religion of nature as it existed then and exists now is not so much because of changes in the physical and vital worlds as in its spiritual and moral department as a result of man's transgression. If nature, when constructed, were fitted up to be God's first temple of worship, as well as a dwelling-place for man, it must still be rich in its primitive facts, laws, wisdom, and moral elements, unless with the fall of man all nature at the same time fell back into unintelligible chaos. This calamity we know did not befall it, for in the material and vital departments individuality, unity, and law still hold undisputed sway.

We should constantly bear in mind that the universe consists of the Creator and created beings and things; of the supernatural and the natural; and that man constitutes now, as in the beginning, the mental and spiritual part of nature. A class of phenomena may be regarded as secondary products—products of the natural or of the supernatural. The honeycomb and the acorn are products of the supernatural; the watch and the engine of the natural. We see in these facts that both the natural and supernatural are still productive, and that their works are manifold; yet even down to the tiniest work, as the spinning of a hair, the distinction between them is preserved. The conspicuous fact must ever be kept before us as a headlight that man, as a part of nature, not only constitutes its moral department, but sustains important relations to other departments. Our conception of the universe is, God on the one side and all things else on the other.

It may be accepted as a truism that fullness, unity, completeness, and harmony must pervade the work of an almighty and infinitely wise Creator. The absence of these elements of perfection, in either the Bible or nature, would be sufficient to vitiate any claim it might set up to be of divine origin. It must also be true that if both the system of nature and the scheme of Christianity have come from God, the latest one in point of time must be, in its teachings, a second edition of the first. The things created will forever present to the intelligent observer a thought side, which must proclaim the wisdom and purpose of the Creator. The world is not merely an aggregation of different kinds of matter into masses, subject to the accidents of motion and change, but rather on every atom, as on a tablet of stone, is written law, order, and purpose, as subjects of human study and interpretation.

Nature and Christianity have been unwisely pitted against each other, as if they were irreconcilable antagonists. What St. Paul says of the natural man, as the opposite of the spiritual man, has mistakenly been applied to all mundane things. In a real or professional vindication of nature and its claims to excellency philosophers have intensified this supposed conflict into a profitless warfare. Both skeptics and Christians have talked and written as if it were a conceded fact that science and religion were naturally destructive of each other, giving employment to a third class, who have attempted a reconciliation. If the depraved nature of man is regarded as a part of nature there is a conflict, and there ought to be. But the fact is, sin is a perversion of nature, and no part of the original constitution of things. No fact of human history is more undeniable than that man, as we know him, is degenerate; that the degrees of his deterioration take in a wide range; but that his ruin can be arrested and the fallen creature started upward on a career of moral improvement. Hence we should not be surprised if a being whose spiritual nature has been eradicated and replaced by sin and a beclouded mind should be at variance with his environments in a world that is "very good." A gambler is in harmony with the card table, a drunkard with the saloon, and we ought to expect that such instances of depravity will find this a world of wretchedness. It ought so to be; such a condition of things is becoming, and indicates that the world is ruled by a righteous Governor. If honor, power, wisdom, and felicity adorned the character of profligate and morally worthless persons, the fact would strike the intelligent observer as something monstrous in the extreme. It is better, more suitable to what our notions of government should be, for us to see moral degradation attended by misery. It is the spiritual, the intelligent, and the morally elevated character that breathes in this world the air of serenity and wears the crown of glory.

When God pronounced this world "very good," man existed, but he had not then defiled himself with sin. The spiritual element, as the controlling power of the life he lived, adjusted his relation to his Creator, to his environments, and to other created intelligences. Such was the clearness of his spiritual vision, undimmed at the time by sin, that first of all in the world around him he apprehended a God revealed. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead." Thus Paul clearly teaches that what may be known of God was manifest to them, for God had showed it unto them. The works of creation should be regarded as a revelation of the Creator himself to beings endowed with such spiritual discernment as enabled them properly to read and interpret their meaning. It was in this spirit that David sang, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." Though they have no speech nor language, without these their voice is heard. Their direction (to holy living) has "gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world."

The entrance of sin into the world, with its attendant train of evils, moral and physical, was a breach of the constitution and laws of nature as established by the Creator in the beginning. The possibility of sin was a necessity. Sin and evil could have gained an entrance into the world in but one way—the voluntary transgression of some intelligence left free to do either right or wrong, and choosing the wrong. Such must have been the origin of moral evil, for it could have had no other. Man, a sovereign, with a limited dominion and under a supreme sovereign, broke the law of allegiance to this higher power, and, as a consequence, plunged into sin; the results were spiritual blindness and death. We affirm that the possibility of sin was a necessity, for an act of virtue implies the possibility of the opposite. An upright life, if forced, could not possess the quality of virtue; and in creation God intended man should be a being who by determining to do right might be virtuous. As the story of paradise philosophically explains the entrance of sin into this world, it, or some other like it, must be true.

The great event of the world's history since the creation of man was the coming of Christ. The relation Christ sustained to nature is by St. Paul expressed as follows: "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him." When the "Word was made flesh," he came as the "repairer of the breach" sin had made in nature, and to this end he took the "government" of the wrecked and ruined world "upon his shoulders." He commenced his mission by giving proof of independence of nature and of his power over it. The ground, the trees, the fish in the sea, winds, waves, life and death were alike subject to his command. But in importance above everything else he had power to forgive sins. "In him" was the spiritual "life" man had lost, and when restored to him it was his "light." Thus it became apparent that he who came to be the "repairer of the breach" in the constitution of nature was abundantly adequate to the task he had undertaken. If nature felt the shock of man's transgression, it felt also the inspiration of the Messiah's coming. He took, in the original constitution of things, for the purpose of repairing it, the place which man, in consequence of sin, had vacated.

But in a preeminent degree was Christ invested with the vital, spiritual, and moral elements of the original constitution of things. In this respect nature had suffered most, and to "repair this breach," and along this line to "restore the old paths" he travailed "in the greatness of his strength."

Christ's life and works in their relation to man must be forever of supreme importance, but to understand them fully man's relation to other departments of nature must also be considered. He was not made to exist isolated and alone; he is but an item in a vast universe, yet he stands most securely when supported by inspiring environments. Man's place in nature, as a part of it, is at the head. His intellectual and moral endowments give him this high distinction. He can hold his post of honor only by filling out the full measure of his vast responsibilities. This place, which he had forfeited by disobedience, is now held by Christ in his behalf, and every man is made to feel more or less the drawing of the Redeemer's power, the uplift of his mighty character, divine and human.

Man's environments and associations have much to do in the development of both body and mind. The island of Terra del Fuego could never give the world a Socrates, a Shakespeare, or a Gladstone. Between such an inhospitable earth and sky humanity can scarcely maintain an existence. If we would make man better we must improve the world he lives in. The weights that crush mind and body must be removed, and their place supplied with whatever gives nourishment and strength to the one, and love, hope, and activity to the other. Could the Fuegians, the Eskimo, and other tribes be persuaded to leave the ice and snows of their wretched lands, their removal to some hospitable climate would be commendable missionary work. By caring for their bodies their souls might in time be reached. As a rule, the conditions of the individual, of society, and of nations have a mighty influence upon character.

It is important, then, that we see Christ not only in the sanctuary and in his relations to us personally, but as occupying in nature the place we have forfeited by transgression. When he shall be recognized as the "Good Shepherd," as the "True Vine," as "the Rose of Sharon," and as "the Lily of the Valley" nature will reappear in its primitive beauty. In Isaiah xxxv we see not only the bold flights of an inspired prophet but a candid expression of human experience, resulting from a spiritual apprehension of Christ in nature. Christian people in all ages, especially new-born souls, have often, in hours of spiritual elevation, experienced the presence of Christ in material and vital nature as herein described.

If, then, nature is the product of divine thought in its intellectual and moral aspects, its teachings should blend with Christianity, and be duplicated wherever they occupy the same ground. As the first or original system was "very good," if the second came from the same source it must be a reproduction of it, or a second edition, only in another form. As the first was adapted to the condition of sinless beings the second is suited to the wants of the fallen and spiritually dead. The object of both is the perfection of man and the completeness of created nature. Though man is but one element in the system, yet the place assigned him is so vast that his lapse has disturbed the whole.

If, then, we shall still be able to read on the broken tablets of nature the fundamental elements of Christianity, the conclusion will be irresistible that if the one is of divine origin so the other must also be. In that case no standing ground whatever can be found for any form of infidelity. If nature is Christian man must be Christian also, or he is a perversion of nature; and do not the facts of experience and observation demonstrate that the nearer man approximates the character of his high yet humble Exemplar the more perfectly he fills his place in the scheme and order of nature? Nature and Christianity, with equal emphasis, teach that virtue is the keystone of the arch of the constitution of the universe, and that with its removal civil, social, and political anarchy and wretchedness will prevail.

It will be well to examine this subject in the light shed upon it by the great Teacher. During his ministry Christ made but little use of the Old Testament Scriptures—barely enough to give to them the sanction of his authority. He recognized the teachings of Moses, the prophets, and the Psalms, as the word of the Lord to the people; but some of their sayings he abrogated and others greatly modified. The most important quotations referred to himself, and these were used to convince the Jews that he was the long-expected Messiah. In no case does he draw from them the basal element of the kingdom he came to establish. He taught as one having authority—as having original knowledge of the whole empire of truth.

But if Christ gave scant attention to the sacred writings of the Jews he never lost sight of the truth contained in the realm of nature. To primitive nature he manifested the utmost respect, and expressed indignation only at sin. He used clay as an ointment for the opening of the eyes of the blind, and pointed to the lily of the field as an instance of glory surpassing all that in which Solomon was arrayed. As an illustration of the ever watchful eye of Providence he refers to the care and fidelity with which the fowls of the air are fed; "They sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." As an illustration of the unity of the human family, and of the brotherly kindness that should prevail among them, he refers to the goodness of the heavenly Father, who "maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." In discriminating between the good and the bad, he points to the good tree that bringeth forth good fruit, and to the bad tree that bringeth forth evil fruit.

On one occasion it seems that Christ's disciples referred to an approaching harvest; at the same moment Christ saw something deeper and more important. Looking out over the interested crowd of people before him he said: "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." How vastly keener and deeper was Christ's spiritual vision than that of his disciples! When they saw only the earthly, he, in the one broad field of nature, saw the spiritual and the heavenly, and he would fix attention upon the more important fact. Another parallel case, that of the vine and its branches, still further elaborates this point. With this as his text Christ delivered a discourse of great beauty and of the most practical utility. He saw in the constitution and course of nature, man being included therein, the elements of the kingdom he came to establish. He labored to fix the attention upon the coming of his kingdom as follows: "He answered and said unto them, When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather: for the sky is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day: for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

The miracle of the loaves and fishes Christ utilizes in teaching the people the spiritual nature of man and his eternal destiny. He charges them with the folly of appreciating more highly the luxury of having eaten of the loaves and fishes than of considering the miracle which had been wrought before their eyes, and then says, "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." Then they call for a sign such as Moses gave when manna came down from heaven. "Yes," said Christ, "your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead." What a commentary on this manna! Then he adds, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever." Christ, the source and nourisher of spiritual and everlasting life, is to the soul as the bread made of flour or meal to the body. Vegetable, animal, mental, and spiritual life compose the vital world, and each is sustained by a method peculiar to itself. Vegetation feeds upon minerals, animals upon organic matter, intellect upon knowledge, and the spiritual element of the mind upon Christ. Whenever these forms of life are found to exist, each as a harmonious whole and properly related to each other, then nature is "very good"—full, complete. As the original man was spiritual, created in God's image, he does not cease to be a part of nature when spiritual life is restored to him under the dispensation of the Gospel. The breach which sin had made in the constitution and order of nature by this work of grace is repaired, and possibly the original has been improved. Christ lays one hand upon the uninjured part of creation, the other upon man, and brings them into harmony again.

"Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God?" is a question often propounded by Christ in his preaching, and nowhere does he find a parallel except in some department of nature. The kingdom of heaven is like unto a grain of mustard-seed, the smallest of all seeds, but, grown, the greatest of all herbs. The workings of the Holy Spirit in the human mind and in the world accord with the development of the life of this small seed—apparently insignificant in the beginning, but grand in the final outcome. The laws per se of vegetable and spiritual life have nothing in common, yet because of the unity of nature they move in parallel lines and observe the same order in their development. Hence the mustard seed in its development illustrates truthfully the nature of the kingdom of heaven. In the process of making bread, the relation the yeast sustains to the meal furnishes Christ the truth which lies at the base of his kingdom. Having the truth provided at his hand he has no occasion to originate it. As the living yeast permeates the entire lump and prepares it for the oven, so the Gospel serves as the power of God unto the salvation of every one that believeth. The different departments of nature move in parallel lines without ever crossing, each observing the same order in its development. Matter observes physical law, life knows no law but its own nature, and in mind and spirituality we rise to a higher plane of being, but in no case do we leave the order which is essential to the unity of nature.

Christ interwove religion with the ordinary affairs of life, that these might be more closely associated with the Church he came into the world to establish. He would bring back to them the charm which departed with the ingress of sin into the world. Apparently his disciples called his attention to a shepherd who sits on the ground caring for his flock, which is quietly feeding upon the hillside. They simply saw the man with his crook in hand and dog lying at his feet. They may have glanced at the flock, and perhaps thought of its utility in providing food and clothing for the family; but this identical scene presented to Christ the elements of the kingdom he came into the world to establish. "I am the good shepherd," he says, and as such he gives a most tender and touching picture of the relation he sustains to believers. Gently he lifts them up and places them on the high plane of moral worth and spiritual blessedness. The great principles of his kingdom which he thus elaborates existed from the beginning, but on a low plane, in the relation the shepherd sustained to his flock. When supplemented by the fullness of the elements of Christianity, with the salvation of man as its objective, the "breach" in nature caused by sin is "repaired," and it appears to be "very good," because complete. When we grasp this great subject as a whole, the parts become more distinct and impressive. As nature is, Christian men must be, or be at war with it.

In many instances Christ says the kingdom of heaven is like unto this or that, and in every instance he draws from nature facts and principles which he incorporates in Christianity as fundamental elements. Whosoever hath improved, it matters not what, shall have more abundance, but whosoever possesses anything and does not improve it, the thing itself will be taken away from him. This deep and most important practical truth is set forth in the parable of the talents. The elements of the parable are well-known business principles, and Christ simply transfers them to the Gospel.

In the parable of the sower and his seed the tillers of the soil must at a glance understand that the preaching of the Gospel to men embodies the same principles as agriculture, only on a higher plane. In the one case it is the living seed that is sown, and in the other the living Gospel; the first acting in the realm of life and the second in the world of mind. At base the substances are different, and each has laws of growth of its own, but in their development both observe the same order. The different departments of the Creator's work reflect light upon each other, and practically they should be held in the closest relations. The more fully man feels that he exists in a religious world, and that he is a part of it, the more vigorous and active will be his religious life. The profound lessons of the judgment day are all brought out in the clearest light in the parable of the tares and the wheat. The barren fig tree is used to show that the patience and long-suffering of God in behalf of an incorrigible sinner may not endure forever. In the parable of the marriage of the king's son we are taught that righteousness is an essential prerequisite to final acceptance; and in the parable of the ten virgins who went forth to meet the bridegroom the lesson of prudence in preparing for future contingencies is enforced. These truths existed in nature; Christ simply draws them out and incorporates them in practical Christianity. In other words, the book of nature is translated into the vernacular of the people. Christ is not so much an originator of truth as its revealer, which in the beginning was incorporated in the constitution and course of nature.

Nature teaches that a faithful shepherd will leave the ninety and nine of his flock and brave the dangers of the wilderness in search of one that has gone astray; that one who has lost a piece of silver will turn away from any sum, however large, which is secure in his strong box, and search for that which is missing; and that a kind father will welcome to his heart and home a repentant returning prodigal: and Christ, when censured because he held sympathetic intercourse with publicans and sinners, availed himself of the principles herein involved to make clear to captious observers the ground on which the Gospel was preached even to the chief of sinners. Along this line Christ had no occasion to enunciate a new doctrine, for nature had already taught the world what it needed to understand; he simply reminded the fault-finders of what they approved, and made an application of it to his treatment of sinners.

The value of nature as an instructor cannot be overestimated. The ant teaches us lessons of industry, and even Solomon was not ashamed to learn of this insect; from the structure of the mouth of a worm a mechanic learned to make the best auger now in use; and mariners learned to fashion the prow of their ships from the study of the breast of a duck. All mechanical structures which are useful and enduring are but the utilization of nature's modes and operations. Art approaches perfection only when it imitates nature. The poetic genius which can touch the springs of nature is sure of immortality.

But nature's properties, forces, and laws are never seen in their highest development except in the realm of mind and morals. The birds are a standing lesson of trust in Providence. The relation of husband and wife, of parent and child, of brother to brother, of man to man and man to God, home, and country, is not based upon a written command addressed to reason, but upon the clearly apparent natural relation the parties sustain to each other. The Scriptures simply recognize and enforce nature's lessons.

The Positive Philosophy has done all that probably can ever be done to divorce the Creator from his works. Its teachers, notably Huxley and Tyndale, would banish from the mind of man the idea of recognizing the supernatural in the present constitution of things. They refuse to see in nature any evidence of wisdom, purpose, or design. They would fix upon the visible universe the stamp of either idiocy or atheism. To rescue nature from this thralldom, its moral department must be allowed to speak and to preach the Gospel in the language of the people. Christianity is one witness, the constitution and course of nature another, and never more than now does society need the united testimony of both.

Art. III.—A COMPARATIVE VIEW OF THE ETHNIC RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY.

Cicero has said, "It is possible to find nations without cities, without arts and sciences, without governments and laws, but not without religion," the great philosopher thus discerning in the universality of religion the fact that man is endowed with religious instincts which lead him to look up to and worship a superior being upon whom he feels himself to be dependent. It is a legitimate and logically necessary deduction that universal instincts are not deceptive, but grounded in the real nature and needs of the being or creature possessing them. This is manifest in nature's lower departments. Wherever there is to be found a universal instinct it is matched by conditions in harmony with it. It is never disappointed. The Author of nature has implanted no need for which he has not provided an ample supply. And most certainly this is so in the highest realm of finite existence—the moral and spiritual realm.

Again, all history bears attestation to the fact that man is a religious being. Wherever we find him in the ages of the past, and study the remains of his workmanship, the fact that he had his altars, temples, and shrines stands out most prominently. Wherever we meet him at present the same tokens of his zeal in religion are to be seen. As Paul, standing in the midst of the statues and altars of Athenian divinities, said, "I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious"—that is, unwisely religious—so the student of human history can say with reference to the race at large. Those who do not worship are far in the minority when we consider the whole race of man.

Another fact as universal as man's religiousness is the fact of his consciousness of sin. He is out of harmony with the "somewhat" within him that "makes for righteousness." His religious services are propitiatory in their purpose and character, and this at times in spite of his theology. As man is sinful it necessarily follows that his religion will bear the marks of his moral imperfection. However correct his religious system may have been at first, if left to himself for any considerable time he would pervert it. The subsequent development of the ethnic religions undoubtedly sprang from this source of perversion.

This last conclusion, therefore, confirms the belief that the ethnic religions did not primarily originate with the arch deceiver of our race, but rather from traditions of a primitive true religion. That man had truth in religion in the beginning must be accepted by all who believe in the unity of the race. The great ethnic religions indicate the fact that their errors are exaggerations or distortions of principles of truth, or, more properly, human philosophy perverting certain great truths. Thus, for example, Parseeism deified the powers of evil that existed as a fact. Ahriman is Satan lifted to the throne of Deity. The problem of evil seemed to have no other solution for the Zoroastrian philosopher. So also the Brahmanistic incarnations are a philosophic perversion of God's original promise to our first parents and the expectation of a divine deliverer. The Brahmanistic philosophers were not content with one incarnation yet to come, but conceived of many in past cycles of time, and of others in the myriad ages of the future. The illimitable past and future must be disposed of in their philosophy. Even polytheism had its origin in one of two sources: in the diversified manifestations in nature of the divine power and presence, as sun, moon, stars, lightnings, and tempests; or in the deifying of symbols of divine worship in primitive times, as the cherubim, the garden of Eden, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Even the serpent, through which our first mother was tempted to sin, with a strange universality has been exalted to be an object of worship.

In comparing the great ethnic religions we are impressed with the unity of certain fundamental ideas to be found in them as we go back to their primitive source, or fountain-head. To do this we must dig away an immense mass of superincumbent rubbish of human speculations. When we have thus done, however, we find the fundamental truths of monotheism, divine providence, divine government, a future of rewards and punishments, human sinfulness met by atonement and expiatory sacrifice. We by no means say that they stand out with the clearness of the Bible revelation; but they are there, to be read by the discerning student of the religious history of our race and to attest the divinity of the Christian doctrine.

The great ethnic religions with which we wish to compare the Christian religion are the living religions of Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Tauism. These are the systems that to-day confront on the great continent of Asia the Christian religion, and with which it contends for empire. We have not mentioned Mohammedanism, for it is manifestly a perversion of Judaism and Christianity, and sprang from them entirely. While a competitor of Christianity, yet all its morality or religious truth is derived from Christianity. The great ethnic religions mentioned above had a different source. Brahmanism, or Vedantism, is the religion that had its origin in the ancient Vedas. The number of its religious books, and their conflicting ideas, make it a task more than herculean to evolve out of these a self-consistent system of religious belief and practice. This accounts for there being such a wide diversity of opinion among Oriental scholars as to what is the true doctrine of Brahmanism. James Freeman Clarke says as to its origin: "There is no personality about it. . . . But what a system! How large, how difficult to understand, so vast, so complicated, so full of contradictions, so various and changeable, that its very immensity is our refuge." The fact is, the unity of the divine personality that inheres in the Christian religion places it in most emphatic contrast with the inconsistent system of Brahmanism. That is a heterogeneous system of human philosophies which have grown out of the religious beliefs of an ancient race. As well try to incorporate in ancient Judaism more recent Pharisaism, Sadducecism, Romanism, Protestantism, and Mohammedanism.

Brahmanism has its three distinctive periods—the Vedic age, the Brahmanic age, and the age of the Purânas. The ancient Vedas, lying nearer the fountain-head of primitive revelation, present more of monotheistic truth, but less of philosophical perversion. In the most ancient period, when the first of the Vedic hymns were produced, there were five deities to whom were ascribed supreme honor. The manner in which this was done leads to the belief that Indra, Varuna, Agni, Savitri, and Soma were but different manifestations of the supreme God, somewhat after the manner of the Scriptures, where God is variously entitled El, Elohim, Jehovah, Adonai, Shaddai. One Vedic hymn declares that these various names represent but one God.

The Brahmanic age was the one in which was developed the system of caste, that has for ages bound with most grievous fetters the people of India. It was the age of priestcraft, when the simpler beliefs and practices of the Vedic age were perverted into a system of cumbrous fasts, purifications, pilgrimages, and the like. It was this age and its religious perversions that gave birth to Buddhism, as a protest against priestly oppressions and religious absurdities, just as middle-age monasticism and asceticism were an ultra protest against worldliness. And yet Brahmanism was but an abnormal development of a great truth in religion, namely, the mystical or inner life. Man, in his efforts at correction of errors or pursuit after truth, always passes the golden mean. The Brahmanic caste is the ripe fruit of the self-righteousness of Hindoo mysticism.

The age of the Purânas is the later age of the religion of the Brahmans. It is the system as it has been affected and modified by Buddhism, Parseeism, Mohammedanism, Christianity. More or less of the influence of all these may be seen upon it; for example, the incarnation and sacrificial life of Krishna was evidently borrowed from the Christian religion, and is of quite modern date. Those who have thought to find in it an older presentation of the doctrines of incarnation and atonement than the scriptural have made a serious blunder. At best the story of Krishna's incarnation of Vishnu is not fifteen hundred years old. In this hurried review we believe we have made manifest the fact that this oldest of the ethnic religions, in its fundamental truths, bears testimony to the divinity of the chief doctrines of our holy religion. These primary doctrines are either grounded in the human religious consciousness or on a primitive revelation to all men. Either proposition supports the divinity of the Christian system.

Buddhism, which had its origin in India about six hundred years before Christ, has been styled "the Protestantism of India." The primary purpose of its founder, Sakyamuni, was to free his countrymen from the fetters that corrupted Vedantism had woven about them. Buddhism was, at first, but a system of morality that recognized the equal rights of man and the moral obligations of all. In its conflict with Brahmanism it was finally driven out of the country of its origin. But it took deep root in Thibet, China, Japan, the Burman Empire, and is to-day the religion of three hundred and fifty millions of people. It has developed into a religion of forms, rites, ceremonies, many of which bear a striking resemblance to those of the Roman Church. These, no doubt, are subsequent additions, as is the cumbrous ritual system of Rome to the simplicity of primitive Christianity. Buddhism, like Brahmanism, is, as to its real doctrines, a subject of much dispute among Oriental scholars, most of whom affirm that it is essentially atheistic. Yet it has a system of idol worship. Images of Buddha, shrines and relics are the objects of worship. It vies with all other religions in the number and splendor of its temples and sacred shrines. Its monasteries and nunneries, and its mendicant priesthood, are as numerous as those of Rome.

With Buddhism there is no such thing as sin in a Christian sense. There is evil to be eliminated, and what we recognize as sin is to be avoided by the seeker after nirvana because of its hurtful consequences, as we would get rid of foul or noxious vapors or poisons. Its heaven is the annihilation of all consciousness, all feeling, all hope or fear, though some, with great reason, contend that nirvana does not imply total absorption of all personality, or annihilation. The fact is, that it is a system of philosophical speculation which leaves out of consideration an intelligent First Cause, and yet accepts the doctrine of a conscious existence after death—a hell of direst evil consequences for what we call sin, a heaven of blissful self-contemplation and elimination of all desire to those who by mystic meditation and avoidance of evil produce in themselves a character free from it.

The ripest fruit of Brahmanism and Buddhism, on minds that have enjoyed a Christian culture and yet in their self-sufficiency have sought by speculation to evolve for themselves a system of religion with the supernatural eliminated, is theosophy, so-called. For profound impenetrable obscurity it is fully worthy of its Hindoo origin. Wisdom concerning God will never be derived from that source. It is an attempt to supplant the magnificent brilliancy of the electric arc with a rush light.

Confucianism, strictly speaking, is not a religious system. Its author, who for two thousand four hundred years has been the teacher of China, did not aim at establishing a religion. His moral precepts were designed for the government of the individual in his present social relations and as a citizen or servant of the State. His teachings have had the effect of stereotyping China for two thousand years. The greater part of the stupendously voluminous literature of China is devoted to comments upon man's interpretation of his moral system. There is but little doubt that the extreme casuistry of his moral teachings has resulted in bringing about the immobility and conservatism of China. It has been disputed whether Confucius believed at all in the existence of God or immortality. Dr. Legge offers indubitable proof, however, to show that he recognized a divine power above man, and that he believed in immortality. But this question sustains the fact before asserted, that Confucianism is not primarily a religion. The only worship that belongs to it at present is ancestral worship. The intelligent Confucianist may, and in fact generally does, participate in the worship of other systems.

Confucius, as a teacher, has been frequently compared with Christ, especially in some of his moral maxims. His negative form of the Golden Rule has been held up as proof that as a teacher he was morally in advance of Christ and Christianity. Let us look at the Confucian rule: "What you do not want done to yourself, do not to others." This is a very insignificant part of the law of unselfish love as laid down by Christ. It aims to keep men from injuring others, and the motive is selfishness. It asks nothing but abstinence from malice and revenge. Christ's rule requires for its fulfillment positive benevolence. A merely accidental, partial coincidence has been made too much of by even Christian scholars. What did Confucius intend? Did he intend to lay down a law of benevolence for the government of heart and life toward all humanity? We think not. Hear him again say, "Recompense injury with justice, and kindness with kindness." And again, "He who recompenses injury with kindness is a man who is careful of his person." There is no doubt that the law of retaliation which to-day prevails with such fearful effect in China is due to the teaching of this same Confucius. There is no real comparison between him and Christ as moral teachers. Blessed will China be when Confucian power and influence are replaced by those of Christianity.

Taoism, the most ancient religious system of China, is exceedingly difficult to define, because of the fact that its forms of belief are diverse and seemingly contradictory. First, there is the philosophy of Lao-tse, which is essentially materialistic. Out of this springs a utilitarian morality which has no higher motive than selfishness. To these have been added a system of magic, and, what is peculiarly strange, a system of spiritism. No people upon the globe live in more constant dread of evil spirits than do the Chinese. Such spirits grin at them from every dark corner and mysterious grotto. They are the prolific source of all evils and misfortunes; they are to be constantly deceived, exorcised, or placated, as prudent reference to personal safety may seem to dictate. The religion of China may be defined as an irreconcilable mixture of Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, with all the degrading attendants of idolatry.

These great ethnic religions are the best examples furnished in human history of the religious impulse in man seeking to satisfy itself through its own speculations. They are a degeneration from primitive purer belief and larger knowledge—a proof of the truth of the apostle's declaration that "when they knew God they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things."

In comparison with them the Christian religion stands out alone—incomparable in its unity, consistency, and the sublimest philosophy, containing every excellency of ethnic religions without exaggeration or admixture of error. The Christian religion had an entirely different development from these. It was an unfolding plan, an upward evolution, each stage of which is marked in the history of the nation that divine Providence made its conservator by clear and unmistakable historical data. Who can tell when Vedantism began? Who can definitely fix the date of any of its sacred books? So with Buddhism and Taoism. Whatever of historical development they had was a retrogression; but the historical development of Christianity was an evolution of increasing holy light upon great central truths until full-orbed day appeared in the incarnation of the Son of God. This, God inspired and preserved; the others, whatever may have been their primitive excellence, in their development were essentially human. And it is an insult to the intelligence of the nineteenth century to place them in the same category with Christianity as being at all the production of a divine inspiration.

In the very nature of the case there can be but one authoritative revelation. Two or more conflicting revelations could not emanate from divine truth. If, then, the Christian Scriptures are a revelation from God of a plan of salvation, consummated in the incarnation, sacrificial death, and gifts of the Lord Jesus Christ, a fortiori it is inspired of God and stands alone in its divine authenticity; and it is a logical absurdity to attribute inspiration to any other system of religious belief. Either the word inspiration presents an intelligible concept, or the supernatural must be eliminated from the Christian religion. That God might make use of a Zardusht, a Gautama, or a Confucius and their systems to bless the people by whom these were the best systems of religion possessed, is not questioned, and the devotees of these systems, because of their faith in the supreme good as they understood it, might find eternal life; yet it does not necessarily follow that God inspired any of these teachers any more than he inspires anyone who seeks now, or has sought in the ages past, to realize the highest possible righteousness in himself or his fellow-man.

There is much loose talk about inspiration, and that is the most vague and unreasonable which assumes to find it in the vast, complex, heterogeneous, and irreconcilable systems of Asiatic religions. Divine inspiration in the ages of human history has had but one sole purpose—the giving to man a revelation of a plan of salvation that concenters in the Christ of the gospels; and when we use the term inspiration with reference to anything else it is as a mere figure of speech, very much as we speak of the divine afflatus in gifted poets.

Whatever view of inspiration, therefore, the Christian thinker holds, it must be such as makes the Bible as a revelation preeminently and singularly the production of the divine mind and purpose. The Christian system cannot admit any other system on the same plane of divine authority with itself.

Art. IV.—JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

In as beautiful an autumn time as poets ever saw the angels came for Whittier, the sweetest singer of the New World, and for Tennyson, the sweetest singer of the Old; and they laid down the lyre with one hand and took up the harp with the other. Whittier came into the world about a year and a half before Tennyson, and left it less than a month in advance of him, the one going away September 7, the other October 6, 1892. Each was the natural offspring of his native soil; the one singularly English, the other peculiarly American. Each was a powerful factor in the better life of the century. Both had such a vision of infinite beauty, such faith in God and love for their fellow-men, that they sang the truth which they found in the outer world and inner heart with a spirit, a charm, which made their own nation and the world listen to them.

Macaulay, in an essay, gives Milton credit for having achieved success in the midst of a brilliant literary age, claiming that the greatest poets appear in the young and crude period of a nation's history. His theory has an illustration in Homer, who appeared so many centuries before Christ that only the dimmest outlines of himself appear, but whose voice is so strong and true and magical that it stirs the mind of the ages with his visions and heroes. Macaulay's theory has a poor illustration in the history of the literature of this country. It was two hundred years after the landing at Plymouth before a single American poet worthy of the name appeared. In this New World, with its beautiful gardens and fruitful fields, its magnificent mountains, sequestered vales and wide-spreading prairies, its majestic rivers and mighty seas, with its sweet home life, the divinest ideal of liberty, and the firm faith in the Everlasting, there was not a son born with enough genius fittingly to sing of its beauty or glory. There were statesmen, and generals, and orators, and one or two prose writers, whose fame belongs to the centuries, but there was not a single poet. Our literature illustrates another theory, that poetry thrives best in the period of a nation's maturity and opulence; that a nation must get something to eat and to wear, and a little for a rainy day, before it feels in a humor to sing much. About all there is of American poetry is confined to the present century. Bryant had his birth the last end of the last century, but his pen began its work in this. Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, and Lowell came next, with births dating from 1803 to 1819. By common consent Longfellow and Whittier stand at the head of the list of American poets in popularity and influence. They were both born in the same year, the former on February 27, the latter on December 17, 1807.

Whittier was born on a farm near Haverhill, Mass. The house was an old-fashioned frame building, which was over a hundred years old at the time of the poet's birth. Most of the leading poets of this century have been city raised and college bred men. Emerson and Lowell were born in Boston, and Holmes at Cambridge, near by. All three were graduates of Harvard. Longfellow was born in Portland, Me., was graduated at Bowdoin, but was soon made professor of modern languages at Harvard, to which chair Lowell was afterward elected. These sons of wealth and social culture and highest learning form a striking contrast to Whittier, the barefooted country boy who hoed in the field, drove the cow, fed the horse, and chopped the wood. In some respects they had the advantage of him, in others he had the advantage of them. Harvard might have smoothed the art of the country boy, sharpened his wit, broadened his view, but the farm at Haverhill was necessary to make him a Whittier. The flowers, the woods, the hills, the streams, the white snow, the blue clay, the yellow stars, all sank into his being and became a part of the fiber of his soul. He was a simple child of nature, and the verses he sang had an inexpressible charm.

The farmhouse was a Quaker home, composed of father, mother, brothers, sisters, uncle on the father's side, and aunt on the mother's. They had the dress, the manner, the faith of the Quakers. The poet was true to the religion of the farmhouse till the day of his death. In his will he made this request:

> It is my wish that my funeral may be conducted in the plain and quiet way of the Society of Friends, with which I am connected, not only by birthright but also by a settled conviction of the truth of the principles and the importance of its testimonies.

It might seem that Quaker stock was rather poor stuff out of which to make a poet. The Friends did not like music; did not believe in it. They frowned upon many amusements and enjoyments that other good people considered innocent. Most of the forms of beauty were distasteful to them. They toned down color, cut off fringes and plumes, silenced merriment, hushed melody, and determined to be plain and serious. How can a singer come out from such? But they had simplicity, indomitable industry, incorruptible integrity, domestic fidelity, personal purity, faith in God and his revealed word, brotherly love; and these are the materials that do make a poet, and they had their incarnation in Whittier. The poet's love for the old farmhouse and those that made it home is one of the most beautiful pictures in the history of his life. At the death of his father the support of the family fell upon him, and some years afterward he moved to Amesbury, giving as one of the reasons his mother's desire to be nearer the church. His love for his mother, who died in 1857, and for his sister Elizabeth, who died in 1864, was little short of idolatry. Because he had the care of a family, or was so satisfied in the bosom of it, he either did not see his way clear or did not care to marry. There is no evidence that, like Irving, he remained single because of any disappointment in love. In his "Snow Bound" how fondly does he turn to the old-fashioned farmhouse and to the loved ones within, and then says:

> Ah, brother! only I and thou
> Are left of all that circle now—
> The dear home faces whereupon
> That fitful firelight paled and shone.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> Yet love will dream, and faith will trust > (Since He who knows our need is just),
> That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

At the age of seven Whittier was sent to the village school, and, like other country boys of that time, he attended the session a few weeks each year, for a few years, and then graduated into the field a full hand behind the horses or scythe. He mentions two books that were great factors in the development of his intellectual life. One was the Bible. Every Sabbath afternoon his mother read and expounded the family volume to him, so that the book became not only the foundation of good character but also the basis of literary merit and fame. There is a little volume printed which contains between three and four hundred of Whittier's verses, with the texts of Scripture that suggested them. Like Tennyson, and many other distinguished poets, he fairly devoured the Scriptures. The other book was a volume of Burns. A Scotch tramp that visited his father's house after having been fed in the kitchen sang some of the songs of Burns—"Highland Mary," "Bonny Doon," and "Auld Lang Syne." The boy was wild with delight. This appreciation was evidence that he possessed the poetic instincts, for Britain since the days of Elizabeth had heard few such songs as those of Burns. When Whittier was fourteen his first school teacher, Joshua Coffin, while on a visit to his house, read some selections from a volume of Burns's poems. The boy was so pleased with them that he asked the teacher to lend him the volume, which he did. Whittier, in a leaflet, says:

> This was about the first poetry I had ever read, with the exception of that of the Bible (of which I had been a close student), and it had a lasting influence upon me.

The soul of the boy at this time was in such a receptive condition that any true poet coming to him would have excited his admiration and imitation; but it was peculiarly fortunate that Burns came to him at the start. This poor Scotch gardener, with scanty wages, living in a poor man's house, struggling against all kinds of misfortune and weakness, with genius enough to be the poet-laureate of the realm, but hired by the government to a menial task at fifty pounds a year, and yet discovering the richest truth in the most unlikely places, the purest gold in the roughest rocks, the costliest pearls in the homeliest shells, finding the splendors of a palace under the roof of straw, the beauties of paradise amid the humblest earthly scenes, the divinest instincts in the breast of the lowliest and most forgotten, with a heart of sympathy for everything God has made, even the little mice in the nest upturned by the plow, pouring the wealth of his affection without stint upon the hearts of his fellow-men; this is the poet whose verses fell like a fresh revelation on the heart of the poor son of a poor farmer at Haverhill. What a pity that the Scottish bard should have had a will so weak and appetites so strong, and that his rising sun, which promised such a glorious day, should have gone down at noon! But he wrote some things that will last as long as the English language is spoken. What Burns was to Scotland Whittier has been to America. Whittier had many of the virtues of Burns with none of his vices, and from first to last made the poetry of the Bard of Ayr his model. His masterpiece, "Snow Bound," is in imitation of Burns's "Cotter's Saturday Night," but is in every way superior to it, and is likely to live as long as the nation endures.

With his native valley, his Quaker home, his Bible, and Burns as material, Whittier began writing verse. After three or four years of experimenting at odd times spared from his farm work, he concluded he would like to have others hear his song. A good country newspaper came to his father's house every week and was eagerly devoured by him. In the paper was a poets' corner, and he wondered whether he could not get into it, and so he tried. He wrote a poem on the "Deity," and sent it to the paper with some fear that it might be refused. He was making fences one day, when the postman, riding by, threw the paper over the fence to him in the field. It contained his poem, and he was so excited about it he could hardly get back to his work. Afterward he wrote that it was the proudest moment of his life. One day he was hoeing in the field, when he was called to the house and told that a man had come to see John Greenleaf Whittier. He wondered who could want to see him. He was barefooted and in his shirt-sleeves, and crept into the house by the back door. After putting on his shoes and vest and coat, and smoothing his hair, he entered the room, painfully embarrassed. The visitor said:

My name is William Lloyd Garrison. I am the editor of the Free Press. I printed your poem on the "Deity," and I was so pleased with it I thought I would come and see what the author looked like. I see you are young. You ought to go to some academy or college and fit yourself for a literary life, to which you are adapted.

When the visitor had gone Whittier talked the matter over with his parents; they told him they had no money for tuition; that they could hardly spare him from the farm if they had the means, and that poetry would not make bread. But the visitor had put in the young man's heart a seed that was to produce a wonderful harvest. He got a farm hand, who understood the shoemaker's trade, to teach him how to make ladies' slippers out of soft leather, and he made enough out of his wares in one season to buy a suit of clothes and pay his tuition and board for half a year. He went to Haverhill Academy, and this meant good-bye to a little spot in one county; it meant hail to the wide world and to service for a race. It was the breaking of the shell from which a bird of sweetest song was to be released. He attended the academy six months, and then, teaching school in the neighborhood for a season, earned money enough for another six months at the academy. When his school days ended he entered life for himself a young man of twenty-one, tall, thin, erect, handsome, bashful, graceful, genial, witty, brilliant in mind, pure in heart—a model Christian gentleman.

Having journalism in view, Garrison secured him a place on the American Manufacturer, printed in Boston. The pay was small, and his knowledge of the subject of protection to American industry being as meager, he went back to the farm. He edited his own county paper for a few months, when, in the summer of 1830, he was elected editor of the New England Weekly Review, published at Hartford, Conn., succeeding George D. Prentice, a brilliant editor and charming poet, who went West to help make Mr. Clay president. He successfully filled the position at Hartford for a year and a half, when his health gave way, and he was compelled to return to the farm. During his editorship in Hartford, though only twenty-four years old, and though he had been out in the wide world only three years, he had made such a literary reputation from his compositions of prose and of poetry that his company issued a volume of his writings, New England Legends, in Prose and Verse. He remained on the farm five years, working off a mortgage on the place, and serving two terms in the State Legislature. He served his constituency with credit, but he was no orator, and gave no especial promise of proficiency in statesmanship, though Wendell Phillips said he was one of the most winning and successful electioneerers he had ever known. He always took a lively interest in politics even to the last; and in the crowd at the old home precinct on election day could be seen the form of the patriarch enjoying the privilege and performing the duty of casting his ballot; and there was a look of awe on the faces of the people, as though a prophet of God stood in their midst with a message from heaven. He was editor of the Haverhill Gazette for nearly a year. In 1837 he went to Philadelphia and took a place on the staff of the Pennsylvania Freeman, of which in a very short time he became chief editor, which position he had held but two months when the office was burned out. The paper continued its publication, and Whittier remained at the head of it a year, when he went back to the farm. Moving to Amesbury, in 1840, he spent the rest of his life in purely literary work, not returning to the journalistic field, except for a period of six months as editor of the Middlesex Standard, in Lowell. In 1857 he was one of a number who started the Atlantic Monthly. He had no money to put in the enterprise, but he gave it his good will and his pen. Though an able writer he was not, like Bryant, a successful journalist. If he had possessed as much journalistic as literary ability he might have founded a great newspaper which would have been a source of power and wealth, and he would not have been compelled to run, every now and then, from the sanctum to the farm to get something to eat. But then the great poet would likely have been lost in the successful journalist.

The country newspaper, with its editor, proved to be as potential a factor in the destiny of Whittier as the volume of Burns. Whittier attained his majority at a time when the slavery question was being hotly discussed. Garrison, the editor of the village newspaper, was a rabid abolitionist, with a deep laid determination to spend his life in a warfare against slavery. When he visited the farmer boy to compliment him on his poem and to encourage a higher education, he no doubt had his eye on the brilliant young man as a helper in his conflict. Whittier entered into hearty sympathy with him in his plans, and said in after life that it was through the personal persistent solicitation of Garrison that he took the active part he did in the antislavery movement. The step required sacrifice. It meant poverty, literary obscurity, social ostracism, hatred by friends, prosecution by the rabble, danger to life; but his Quaker doctrine and his conscience told him it was right, and that was enough for him. He could get but little pay for his literary productions. Few publications dared print an article or poem with his name. He was twice mobbed, in one instance escaping barely with his life. While editor of the antislavery paper in Philadelphia the large hall and his paper in it were burned by the mob.. Not an issue was suspended. The next one after the fire contained an editorial from the pen of Whittier, from which we quote:

> Woe unto us if we falter through the fear of man! Citizens of Pennsylvania, think not the intimidation will drive us from our post. We feel that God has called us to this work, and if it should be his purpose to finish what we have begun he can preserve us, though it be as in the lions' den or the sevenfold heated furnace.

Losing life, he found it; found a comfortable support, literary fame, the praise of the people, the shouts of the rabble, the gratitude of mankind. Whittier became so warmed up on the subject at the start that at the age of twenty-four he published a volume against slavery at his own expense, saving the money out of his scanty earnings on the farm; and from that time on he wrote incessantly in prose and poetry in opposition to slavery. Many of the poems written between 1833 and 1848 were collected into a volume called "Voices of Freedom." These poems were terrific, provoking the South, inflaming the North. That an apostle of brotherly love could sing such bitter things only illustrates the fact that there is no hate so hot as that of incensed love. There were many great characters in the early abolition movement, among them Sumner, Phillips, Whittier, Beecher, Mrs. Stowe, and scores of others who could be named; but Garrison was the ringleader of them all. He nagged the South, he nagged the North, he fretted and fumed, and more than any other one man stirred the mind and the conscience of the nation into the tempest that swept away disunion and slavery. In 1863 Garrison has this to say of Whittier:

> There are few living who have done so much to operate upon the public mind and conscience and heart of our country, for the abolition of slavery, as John Greenleaf Whittier.

Napoleon laid great stress upon the value of music in the efficiency of his army. In our war the bugle, the cornet, the fife and drum were found to be as necessary as ammunition wagons. In the conflict between liberty and oppression, in almost every land and time, the poet has been called to stand by the ruler and warrior for the support of the right, to inflame the heart, to nerve the hand, and inspire the hope of the people. The voice of God that called for Cromwell called for Milton too. The voice of God that called for Lincoln from the forest called Whittier, Bryant, Lowell, and Longfellow. The spiritual kinship between the Puritan and Quaker singer of freedom is expressed in lines referred to by Sir Edwin Arnold, while visiting the poet at Oak Knoll three years ago. Mr. Arnold said:

I wish you could come across the Atlantic to see under the memorial window to Milton, in St. Margaret's Church at Westminster, your own admirable verse:

> The New World honors thee, whose lofty plea
> For England's freedom made her own more sure > Thy page, immortal as its theme, shall be,
> Their common freehold while the worlds endure.

When the war came Whittier found himself in a predicament. He had spent thirty years conscientiously stirring up a war which his religion would not let him indorse; for the Quakers were as much opposed to war as to slavery. He had been active in the organization of the political parties out of which the Republican party was evolved, and in that party itself, working and voting for Lincoln; and now, at the beginning of his administration, the poet's Quakerism compelled him to deprecate a resort to arms. He stopped at once, declining to write a line in favor of war. In obedience to a conscience which he always served he stopped at the edge of the war, but the momentum carried his services and personality into it, and became a powerful factor in its issue. The question of slavery was woven into every uniform of blue and hammered into every musket of steel, and no one could separate them. Whittier's verses were sung at recruiting stations and on the field. After the defeat of Bull Run the Hutchinson family inspired the Army of the Potomac with songs. For singing Whittier's "Ein Feste Burg" the officer expelled them from the lines, sharing the opinion of many good people that the war would not be of long duration, and that it would be imprudent to say or sing unfriendly things about slavery. The singers went to President Lincoln with the matter. He asked Secretary Chase to read the whole poem in open cabinet meeting. Lincoln said: "It is just the kind of a song I want the soldiers to hear," and by a unanimous vote of the cabinet the family was sent back into the lines to sing Whittier's song.

Whittier was a good while learning to make his best verse. Bryant wrote his "Thanatopsis" while he was in his teens. Whittier's earlier poems were most of them crude, containing, however, the prophecy of what he was to be. He wisely suppressed from his published volumes many of his earlier poems. He did not come up rapidly, like the tree that cannot last half a generation, but slowly, like the elm that intends to live for centuries. His poetry got better and better, his vigor of mind and warmth of heart being preserved to the last. His poems at fourscore are like the fruit hanging in the orchard, rosy and sweet, after the frost has scattered the leaves. The lines to Holmes, in August last, are like an apple, beautiful and luscious, plucked from a bough on which the snow has fallen. Here they are:

> The hour draws near, howe'er delayed and late,
> When at the Eternal Gate,
> We leave the words and works we call our own,
> And lift void hands alone
> For love to fill. Our nakedness of soul
> Brings to that Gate no toll:
> Giftless we come to Him who all things gives,
> And live because he lives.

How kindly nature has dealt with Bryant, Longfellow, and Whittier, who loved her so! After having led them under spring blossoms and through yellow wheat she gave them an Indian summer before the winter came.

Whittier was not an original poet. He created no new world of thought, peopling it with creatures of his imagination, and hence cannot be ranked among the greatest poets of the world, such as Dante and Milton. This country has produced as yet no such original mind, and it is a wonder, for the material ought to be in the blood and the environment. This hero-poet will appear not in our time, but in the generations or centuries to come. If Whittier did not create any new world he did that which was of as much practical advantage to our time, he found a world already made full of people just at hand, worthy of his affection and study. His characteristic was what Carlyle calls the chief element in the true poet—sincerity. He pictured things and thoughts just as he saw them, adding nothing to, taking nothing from them. He was a true painter of the outer form of nature. His poems of nature are exquisite, and remind us very much of Bryant. Among the best are "Hampton Beach," "A Dream of Summer," and the "Last Walk in Autumn," in which we find:

> Along the river's summer walk,
> The withered tufts of asters nod;
> And trembles on its arid stalk
> The hoar plume of the golden-rod.
> And on a ground of somber fir,
> And azure-studded juniper,
> The silver birch its buds of purple shows,
> And scarlet berries tell where bloomed the sweet wild rose.

Without money or travel, college or library, nothing was left for Whittier but to take up the things nearest to him at home. Burns did the same thing, and both made the kinds of poets the people like to read. The poet of Haverhill did not busy himself with Niagara, or the Alps, or flowers of exquisite hues in some fair south land, or with beautiful women and great men in some country a thousand miles away. The streams and hills and flowers and people around his house were good enough for him. He spent his life with them, learned all about them, told his fellows of them, and became the New England, the American, poet. His characters were not kings and conquerors, but mostly plain people that he knew. His songs of labor have been an inspiration to many sons of toil.

Whittier was not only a faithful painter of the outer forms of nature, but he was a true interpreter of their hidden meaning. He was a seer—a see-er into nature. As sand turns to window pane, through which the flower garden can be seen, so the clay covering over nature by a divine alchemy turned to crystal, and he saw through it a world of inexpressible beauty, the very garden where God lived and loved. Scott and Burns sketched the outer forms of beauty with an artist's hand, but Wordsworth and Whittier saw deeper and found infinite beauty. It was in obedience to his Quaker teaching and instinct that Whittier found the Spirit in silence, and behind the forms.

In his writings the poet has pictured himself—not the outer features seen in a mirror, the black eyes, the high forehead, the benign face—but the man within, enwrapped in the robes of flesh. He did not busy himself with finespun theories nor differences of philosophy, but spent much of his time studying himself. What he thought, what he felt, what he knew, he wrote, and he wrote it because he knew it to be true. He infused his personality into his lines. As pictures of landscape are sometimes made so that by a little study they resemble some person we know, so Whittier's pictures of nature and of life resemble him. In describing truly the inner life of a true man the poet of Amesbury describes the heart of humanity, and this is why he became the object of the nation's pride and love.

As behind the clay forms that covered nature he saw infinite beauty, so in the inmost center of man's inner world he found God. Back of the intellect he found infinite wisdom back of human affection infinite love. We have come now to that which most characterized him as a man and poet—his religion. He was eminently a religious poet. In his words and works he was a living commentary on the Scriptures. The Latin vates meant prophet as well as poet. If any man deserved to bear that title it was Whittier. He was a prophet, a finder of the mystery of God in nature, in humanity, in the Book, and a faithful revealer of that mystery to the children of men. He felt that his words were from the divine promptings, that his acts were performed in obedience to the divine command. Now he stands on Sinai to cry out against the sins of the people and voice God's anger against them, and now he stands at the cross of his Saviour in tears, singing of love and of life. The world loves to hear him sing because his voice and lyre are tuned to the melodies of heaven. Longfellow beautifully refers to his spirituality, in lines written on Whittier's seventieth birthday:

> O thou, whose daily life anticipates
> The life to come, and in whose thought and word
> The spiritual world predominates,
> Hermit of Amesbury! thou, too, hast heard
> Voices and melodies from beyond the gates,
> And speakest only when thy soul is stirred!

Take them as a class there never lived a people more brilliant in intellect, correct in morals, and pure in spirituality than the people of New England at the time Whittier came upon the stage. They had such literal faith in God, in prayer, in providence, in the Bible, in the atonement, in immortality, that life was a terribly solemn thing, and duty was the undisputed sovereign of thought and of act. They never thought of anything but making religion the chief end, the all of life. With all their faults their civilization will not be surpassed, if matched, by any for a hundred years to come. Whittier was the religious exponent of his time. He was a Quaker, but, as some one has said, the Quaker was only a Puritan dressed in drab. Excepting Milton, Whittier was the greatest poet of Puritanism that ever lived. He believed the cardinal doctrines of Christianity as taught by most of the Churches of his time and most of the Churches of our time. His faith in the atonement is expressed in the "Crucifixion," which closes as follows:

> And shall the sinful heart alone,
> Behold unmoved the atoning hour,
> When nature trembles on her throne,
> And death resigns his iron power?
> O, shall the heart, whose sinfulness
> Gave keenness to his sore distress,
> And added to his tears of blood,
> Refuse its trembling gratitude?

His trust in divine Providence is voiced in a poem which contains this verse:

> And thou, O Lord, by whom are seen
> Thy creatures as they be,
> Forgive me if too close I lean
> My human heart on thee.

His intense love for Christ is breathed in "Our Master," which will live as long as "Snow Bound." We copy two stanzas that contain a whole volume of essential truth:

> Apart from thee all gain is loss,
> All labor vainly done;
> The solemn shadow of thy cross
> Is better than the sun.
>
> Alone, O Love ineffable!
> Thy saving name is given;
> To turn aside from thee is hell,
> To walk with thee is heaven.

The warmth of brotherly love, which was a part of his love for God, can be felt in almost everything he has written.

In the literary history of nations men of genius have often been so reckless in their morals that the world half looked for social weaknesses where the poetic instinct was discovered. Whittier, and the cluster of great men contemporary with him that made American poetry what it is, have shown that temperance, social purity, and religious vigor are most becoming to the poet. That Whittier, a man who never touched wine in its mildest form; who had the courage to propose the health of the shoemakers in a glass of cold water; who was so religious that he performed every act with reference to the last day; who was so consecrated that Christ's image was in his character and Christ's spirit in his life; who closed almost every poem with an exhortation to be good, to love God and man—that such a man should be about the best-loved poet the country has ever produced is an evidence of the encouraging condition of the public conscience.

Whittier will live. The people of this country have placed upon his brow a wreath of laurel leaves more enduring than the crown that rests on the kingly head. Homer, not the kings of antiquity, rules the past; Shakespeare, not the kings whose greatness went down with the platforms on which they stood, rules England. Whittier rules an empire broader than Victoria's—the mind and heart of this great nation.

According to the fable Orpheus struck his lyre with such skill that trees and rocks began to move and keep step to his music, and wild beasts, charmed by his strains, came from the forest and gathered about him. The fable becomes fact. Whittier struck his lyre with such magical force that iron fetters fell apart, and greater than trees and rocks set themselves in motion. Immortal beings, stirred by his lyre, marched out to the mightiest tragedy the world has seen. And when the tumult was over, millions were charmed by his songs of peace and of love. The lyre of Orpheus, as it floated down the Hebrus, continued to sound forth the same strains as when touched by its master's fingers. Whittier's lyre, as it floats down the stream of years, will continue to send forth its sweet strains, and coming generations will be charmed with its music of love and of heaven.

Art. V.—SOME RECENT EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

There are many problems in educational matters whose solution will be fully disclosed only by time. But we may often anticipate the future if we can take accurate measurements in even a small segment of the recent past. The interest and value of educational statistics lie in this: they enable us to ascertain the trend of events, and to see whither the slow processes of change are tending which affect the institutions of higher education, as well as all other organisms of society.

In the February number of the Educational Review, 1892, Professor A. M. Comey, of Tufts College, presents some statistics which have attracted much attention, showing the attendance at the colleges of the United States at decennial periods since 1850. In order to obtain a fair basis of comparison only male students in college classes are enumerated, all female students and students in preparatory and professional schools being omitted. Professor Comey uses these statistics to prove only the hitherto unknown and gratifying fact that the rate of increase in the number of college students in the United States is much greater than the rate of increase in population; but as the statistics are given in detail for each school it is possible to use them in drawing other deductions.

Omitting the Southern States, as we shall do in all the statistics of this article, and considering only the decade 1880–1890, the increase in the population of the United States was 26.7 per cent. During the same decade the increase in students in college classes in all schools of the United States was 53.1 per cent, while during the same time the increase in students in Methodist schools was 52.3 per cent. Our Methodist colleges are, therefore, holding their own in the general rapid advance of higher education in this country.

We see, also, that the increase in attendance is a differential increase. The line of advance is not an even one. Certain groups of schools are pushing forward swiftly, others are progressing slowly but steadily, while still others have fallen behind and are passing to the rear. The State universities, for example, have grown during the last decade at the rate of 93.6 per cent. This is far above the average, but some allowance should be made for the fact that these schools, with the exception of the University of Vermont, are situated in the West, where the increase in population has been most rapid, and where the competition with strong denominational schools is least.

On the whole, the larger schools of the country are growing much faster than the smaller ones. In New England, for instance, more than one half of the male college students are at Cambridge and New Haven, while the remainder are distributed among thirteen other colleges; and while the increase in these thirteen colleges was 26.2 per cent, the increase in Harvard and Yale was 64.2 per cent. The same law obtains among the schools of Methodism. The rate of increase of our seven larger schools was 84.4 per cent, although, as we have seen, the rate of increase of all our schools was but 52.3 per cent. The differential increase in favor of the larger schools is especially marked in those States in which we yet have several competing colleges. The increase of the Ohio Wesleyan University was 94.8 per cent; that of the four other Methodist colleges in Ohio 18.6 per cent: the increase in the Northwestern University was 103 per cent; the decrease in the four other Methodist colleges in Illinois 24.5 per cent: the increase in Cornell College was 146.9 per cent; the increase in the three other Methodist colleges in Iowa 45.3 per cent. The cumulative effect of this law of increase is exhibited in the statistics of collegiate attendance, male and female, at our Methodist colleges, as given in their catalogues for 1892. Omitting schools for women only, in seven colleges the number of students in the four college classes ranges from two hundred and forty-four to five hundred and thirty-one, an average of three hundred and thirty college students to each school; in seven it ranges from one hundred to one hundred and eighty, an average of one hundred and thirty-four to each school; in twenty-eight the collegiate attendance is less than one hundred, and averages thirty-eight to each school.

The centralization of patronage thus exhibited is partly the cause and partly the result of an equally noticeable concentration of financial support. The educational benefactions of the Church have not been uniformly distributed, but have been massed upon certain schools. This is clearly shown by statistics of annual income, perhaps the most reliable measure of financial strength. The carefully prepared and valuable tables published in the Report of the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church, January, 1892, give the annual income of some five institutions of higher education as above $50,000. The average income of these schools is $102,633. The income of five is from $20,000 to $50,000, their average income being $35,849. The income of seven is from $10,000 to $20,000, their average income being $12,918. An annual income of less than $10,000 is reported from twenty colleges and universities, their average being $5,765. There are reported the incomes also of twenty academies and seminaries. The average income of these secondary schools is $12,034. There are five colleges and universities and eight secondary schools whose incomes are not reported. A considerable number of the twenty-five institutions of higher education whose income is below $10,000, or is not reported, are situated west of the Missouri River, and we may well anticipate for them a growth equal to the growth of their young and vigorous States; but the chief distinction between many of the twenty-five colleges and universities on the one hand, and the twenty academies and seminaries on the other, is probably a geographical one—a difference of nomenclature between the East and the West.

There can be no doubt that the rate of increase in wealth, and in all that wealth supplies, has been much greater in the larger than in the smaller schools, and that the gap between them in financial resources is widening even faster than the gap in attendance. The productive endowment, less indebtedness, of our ten colleges and universities whose income is over $20,000 (and is it possible to maintain a college with less?) aggregates $4,886,079—an average of $488,608. The productive endowment, less indebtedness, of our thirty-two colleges and universities whose income is less than $20,000, or is not reported, is $698,635—an average of $21,832; while the productive endowment, less indebtedness, of the twenty-five colleges and universities whose income is less than $10,000 is $171,438—an average endowment for the support of each school of $6,857.

In the above statistics we have evidence of a profound and rapid change whose import we cannot fail to recognize. In number of students, in rate of growth, in financial resources, and in all that depends upon financial resources, our schools are differentiating into two classes, and the interval between them is constantly widening. It is a natural process, unforced and unchecked by artificial means; it is the readjustment of our educational system to the changing conditions of society. The centralization now in progress in the institutions of higher education resembles the centralization in population, by which the large cities of the United States are growing so much more rapidly than are the smaller cities and towns and the rural districts, and its causes are not entirely dissimilar.

The pioneer colleges of the country were not merely planted with the wise prodigality of nature, which scatters a hundred acorns for each oak that is to be; but in numbers as well as in equipment they corresponded with the needs of the time rather than with the hopes for the future. They were numerous because means of communication were imperfect. Their patronizing territories were described by the radius of the stage line. When the railway took the place of the stage line the circles of patronage surrounding each school widened and overlapped. A struggle for existence was begun. It became impossible to protect a school by its isolation or by any official cordon.

Most of the students in the early colleges were in the preparatory schools, and the requisites for admission were so low, and conditions so freely made, that a large number of their college students would be classed as sub-collegiate under the standards of the better institutions. Such schools found strong competitors in high schools and seminaries, which not only prepared students for college, but also paralleled a good deal of the college course. The rise of the high school and seminary is one of the causes of the decline, relative or absolute, of the small college. But the chief reason for its decline is the change that has taken place in educational standards. No epoch in the history of education is more critical than that through which we are now passing, which sees the disappearance in the United States of the old education and the triumph of the new. The old education had many merits—the merits mainly of the monastic ideal. Austerity, self-denial, the bearing of the yoke, were the characteristics of this noble discipline. From its dark and silent cloisters, into which little entered less abstruse than mathematics or more modern than the extinct languages, the student emerged into a world of intense and multifarious activities—an alien world, in which the knowledge he had gained was accounted useless, and the motives under which he had gained it were unknown. Whatever the faults of the new education may be, it at least remedies this, which I conceive to be the great fault in the old—it articulates the school and the world. It does not ignore discipline, but it disciplines the mind by imparting knowledge, interest, and control in those subjects which are of value after graduation, as well as before it, and in which the future intellectual life of the student must be led. Its aims are lasting ones—the enrichment of life, the acquisition of knowledge, the search for truth. The college is, therefore, no longer a cloister remote from life, and from which its sights and sounds are excluded. It is rather an eminence from which the plain of life can be viewed in all its fields, and mapped and comprehended before the student descends into it.

The modern ideal of a liberal education is therefore as broad and as complex as is the scientific view of life which constitutes and defines it. It embraces a knowledge of history, the history of races and nations, of institutions and ideas. As the body of man is said to traverse the same stages in the few months of its prenatal existence which was accomplished by the organic life of the planet in the countless ages of its development, so the mind, in the brief formative period of its education, must review the same stages which our ancestors passed over in the long history of the evolution of civilization. A liberal education includes a knowledge of literature, the record of the inner experiences, the aspirations and the ideals of humanity. To a student speaking the English language it is primarily a knowledge of the noblest, fullest, and richest of literatures—the literature of his own tongue. It has been said by President Gilman that "a liberal education absolutely requires that every English-speaking person should have a knowledge of French and German also;" and certainly a reading knowledge of these languages is essential to advanced work in almost any kind of research. We need only mention the long-established claims to a place in college courses of the languages of the chief intellectual races of antiquity, the Hellenic and the Roman. No man can be called liberally educated to-day who has not acquired the conceptions of the worlds of matter and life, their origin and goings on, which science gives, and for this, as for so many other uses, mathematics is indispensable. One of the duties of any system of education which can be called liberal is to fit the student for citizenship, and it therefore includes economics and sociology, and the customs of international comity. If a liberal education is to prepare for a life fulfilling the comprehensive words of Goethe, Im Ganzen, Guten, Shoenen, Resolut zu leben, it must devote a larger place to art than is allotted at the present time. No education can be called liberal which does not teach fully the phenomena of mind as given in consciousness and by experiment; which does not include ethics and the history of ethical theories; and which does not allot a prominent place to the history of religion and to those complexes of truth which constitute the evidences of theism and Christianity.

Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the comparative value of different studies in the new education, there is little as to methods and aims. The student must be taught the methods of research. He is led into the laboratory and the observatory; he uses the microscope, the balance, the blowpipe, and the scalpel. He consults original documents; he reads authors rather than critics; he learns how to investigate and judge for himself; and, above all, he has everywhere the guidance of men whose entire lives and interests are bound up in the subject of their instruction; who are not mere teachers of texts, but who, by virtue of their own investigations and scholarship are linguists and mathematicians, biologists, geologists, astronomers, physicists, chemists, historians, metaphysicians, and littérateurs. Otherwise the knowledge the student gains is without body, substance, or life. It is unreal and shadowy—the dead, dry, and scattered bones in the valley of a dream.

We have set forth the ideals of a liberal education at greater length than any novelty in their presentation will warrant; but our purpose is attained if these statements, however trite, serve in any way to emphasize how complex must be the modern college, whose function it is to provide an education so broad and comprehensive and thorough; how numerous must be its teachers, how costly its equipment, how extensive its libraries and apparatus and collections. Nor can we see any signs of a return toward older and simpler conditions. It is true that there is at present a strong trend toward more complete specialization, toward narrower courses of study pursued to greater length. The comparative value of this special training we will not discuss; it is sufficient to notice it and the vogue it is obtaining, and the still heavier burdens which it lays upon the colleges, since their own specialization is out of the question. I am speaking, I hardly need say, not of the university, constituted of graduate and professional schools, but only of undergraduate instruction—only of the college of liberal arts, whatever its associate schools may be.

With so complete a change of educational ideals a readjustment in the institutions of higher education was inevitable. A few schools have been endowed—only a few could be—and the remainder of the early colleges, so readily planted and once so easily maintained, are withering away because they have not much root. It is not strange that these schools, with a few underpaid and overworked teachers, often set down in country villages, without books, apparatus, society, or the inspiration of numbers, isolated from the currents of thought, and afflicted with intellectual and material poverty, should be able to gather in only a few students from adjoining counties, and have never really outgrown the status of the preparatory school.

To use again the schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church to illustrate what is true of the schools of all denominations: in our own colleges and universities whose income is less than ten thousand dollars or is not reported, only one seventh of the entire enrollment is in college classes—an average of forty college students to each college. The good that colleges of the early type have done is incalculable. They trained the leaders of the nation in every department of life. Their teachers were noble and self-sacrificing men, often of great skill in instruction and sometimes of profound erudition. Together with the Christian ministry they have done much to uphold in American society the ideals of plain living and high thinking. But the relative or absolute decline of the survivors of this type of college is due to the fact that for want of means they cannot teach what men want taught, or cannot teach it as men want it taught. The parable of President Garfield, who described the ideal college as consisting of Mark Hopkins and his log, is often used to set forth the advantages of the schools without equipment; but does it not exaggerate? There is no question, indeed, as to the universal presence of the log, with all the barrenness which it represents; but how few who ever took their seats on one end of it found a Mark Hopkins on the other! Whatever the actual advantages of weak colleges may be, the popular verdict is against them. And from States where they are most numerous there is a yearly exodus of the brightest young men and women to better equipped colleges in other States. The residents of Ohio, says President Eaton, who are attending college elsewhere, are two hundred and one more in number than the residents of other States attending college in Ohio.

There has been put upon the weaker colleges of the country a stress in the struggle for existence, a strain in the futile effort to do the work of better equipped competing schools, which has brought about a certain slight deterioration in manners if not in morals. My illustrations here will be drawn impartially from the schools of all denominations. Everybody who is widely read in the literature of college catalogues has noticed an innocent exultation that finds its ground in various things. In one instance which I recall, the position of the university was the cause of boasting. It was central in the State, central in the Mississippi valley, central in the United States of America. This university had about one hundred students all told. The number of college sites which, on account of the enrapturing beauty of the scenery, are among the finest in America must be reckoned by dozens, and the number of college buildings which have been pronounced by competent judges to be among the best in the country, by scores. Sometimes these superlatives are bestowed upon the museum or the society halls or the athletic fields. In a current catalogue it is the president's residence which compares favorably with that of any other residence in the country, and in a few instances the personal appearance of the president warrants the insertion of his portrait, perhaps accompanied with those of his worthy colleagues in the faculty.

It is the same pressure from competition which leads to the introduction into college catalogues of paragraphs which must be classified as fictitious literature. Such are reports of endowments long since consumed by current needs, pictures of college buildings as yet castles in Spain, lists of elective studies from which the entire class must choose, and statements of requisites for admission that remain unenforced. How much better the delightful frankness of the western university as to its requisites for admission, which states that "entrance examinations are not conducted here after the rack and torture methods that obtain in some institutions. New students are classified on their own representations of work done; and their ability to master work assigned determines permanent classification."

The weighty name of university, imposed by its unforeseeing founders, has often required fictitious bolstering. In order to validate the title I have known a "university" with three or four professors to segregate itself into eight or ten departments, the last, but really not least, of which was the Sunday School Normal Department!

If we add to the temptations arising from competition an entourage largely without culture and often unable to distinguish between the sham and the real in education, and especially susceptible to outward show, we have the conditions under which buildings and grounds and all that appeals to the eye and can be used for pictorial advertisement have been made to outweigh men and books and educational apparatus, which constitute a college. One of our oldest and wealthiest universities deserves all praise because it has erected no new building for twenty years, but has applied its large donations to higher needs. The value of buildings and grounds of the twenty-five Methodist colleges and universities whose income is less than ten thousand dollars, or is not reported, is to their productive endowment, less debts, as twenty-six to one, while in our six wealthiest schools the ratio is less than three fourths to one.

The graduate school, so essential a part of the university, is imitated with fatal facility. It can be set going without adding a teacher to the faculty or a book to the library. The only expense is printer's ink. Courses of graduate study leading to high degrees are therefore very popular—to be pursued, of course, in absentia, as the university has not the slightest equipment for graduate instruction in residence. I recall such a course leading to the degree of Ph.D., advertised in the catalogue of an institution in whose classical course Virgil is read in the first term of the junior year, and Anabasis in the third term of the sophomore, and whose faculty contains four professors. Now that the degree of Ph.D. is no longer conferred pro honore, no college should offer it unless prepared to provide the necessary facilities and instruction for study in residence, and such study should be absolutely requisite for the degree.

After all, it is only in self-protection, and by the same instinct of protective mimicry which clothes the weak species well-nigh extinct with the color or semblance of stronger and successful rivals, that many of the weaker colleges of the country have assumed the titles or outward appearance of larger institutions. And sorry as are these mimetic adaptations, they have probably been successful in a measure. Among communities of a certain degree of culture a "university" may succeed in obtaining pupils when it might fail if it frankly called itself a seminary. At least it is the contention of some who understand the surroundings of these schools, that to change their names to correspond with facts is to slaughter them. But the assistance gotten from these devices is at best transitory. There is a growing class of people whom they do not deceive; and as culture and knowledge in educational matters increase the time is coming—is it not here already?—when every advantage is with the school whose work and name correspond frankly with its means. The need for good fitting schools is becoming more and more urgent. The number of young men unable to complete the lengthened college courses is increasing. We believe that the place of safety in the struggle for existence for our weaker colleges lies here, the place of success also in attendance and in quality of work. The only difficulty is that, as a rule, their means are insufficient for good seminary work, as we have seen.

The action of the General Conference of 1892, recommending a classification of Methodist schools, will be useful, even if we are to regard it as advisory rather than imperative. It will assist the natural tendency and process which it has been the purpose of this paper to set forth and explain—the progressive centralization of our educational interests. It discourages the foundation of new and unneeded institutions. However heartily we may wish that all our colleges might be adequately endowed, I suppose there is no one who understands the financial requirements of the modern college who considers it within the limits of possibility. How few of our colleges are already adequately endowed can be seen at a glance from the statistics already given. Indeed, is any college of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States adequately endowed, estimating simply by the endowment of other institutions? Is there a single Methodist school which ranks in income with competing schools in its own district? According to the last report of the Commissioner of Education, 1888–1889, in New England, Wesleyan ranks eighth in income and Boston third; in New York, Syracuse ranks fifth; in Pennsylvania, Dickinson ranks seventh; in Ohio, Ohio Wesleyan ranks fourth; in Michigan, Albion ranks second; in Indiana, it is a close race between the University of Indiana and De Pauw;* in Wisconsin, there are four schools with a larger income than Lawrence, and in Illinois two, if we include the new University of Chicago, with a larger income than the Northwestern; in Minnesota and Iowa, Hamline and Cornell each rank third. On every educational field east of the Missouri, unless it is in Indiana, we are beaten by heavier batteries. The most that the Church can do is to wisely strengthen those schools whose success has demonstrated the eminent fitness of their locations to be the future educational centers of Methodism. The endowment of each of these schools should be read in the millions. Less than this means loss of prestige and influence, an inferior rank and inferior work, whose results will not be confined to the colleges, but will permeate the entire Church. Certainly we must provide our Methodist young people with at least as good facilities in our own colleges as are offered elsewhere; their education must be as thorough and broad as that of any other body of youth.

But our responsibility is a wider one. In common with our sister Churches we have undertaken to educate the youth of the United States. The responsibility for the scholarship and culture of a nation is upon us—a responsibility whose only measure is the value to a great people of knowledge and science and all that pertains to the intellectual life; for the college is as indispensable to the intellectual life of the nation as the Church is indispensable to its Christian morality. This is not gainsaid by the fact that there are educated men outside colleges and moral men outside churches. Mediocre colleges infect an entire people with intellectual mediocrity. The distribution of ability in the United States coincides with the geographical distribution of the best institutions of learning.

* Income not stated.

The educational responsibilities which rest upon the Methodist Episcopal Church cannot be delegated or abandoned. We can ask no other Church to do our work, and still less can the Churches relegate their educational interests to the State. The State is now doing but a fraction of the work of higher education. Only 13.5 per cent of the college students of the United States are in State universities. Nor has the State proven itself so generous a patron that we may hope that it ever will assume the entire burden of which it is now carrying so small a share. There are other objections to State schools, but the chief reason for the continuance of the colleges of the Christian Churches, as for their existence in the past, is the religious spirit that pervades them. To love God is in the deepest sense a liberal education. The abnegation of the selfish instinct, the consecration of life to its noblest ends, the alignment of the individual with the religious life of the race, the experimental knowledge of the vital truths of God and the soul—these are results in education which have been definitely set before the schools of Methodism, and largely attained through the divine blessing. And these results more than outweigh anything that may have been lacking in the education of the mind.

Is there, then, any escape for the Church from these weighty responsibilities, so little realized, so inadequately met, and so rapidly increasing? Not until the time comes when our educational foundations achieve complete independence—an independence, like that of the adult son, prepared and rejoiced in by the parent, an independence which will leave untouched every tie of affection and common interest and religious belief. Such an ultimate differentiation of function in society is very probable, by which the institutions of higher education in the United States will become, as some have already become, completely individualized and separated from all other organizations, ecclesiastical and secular.

The only escape for the Church from the burden of her colleges lies in making them financially independent, the only escape from our educational duties lies in doing them.

Art. VI.—THE THEOLOGY OF MILTON.

A train toils for hours across the plains away from the foot-hills of the Rockies, yet at nightfall two or three peaks still stand out bold and gloomy. For two hundred years the Anglo-Saxons have been receding from the English civil war; thirty thousand to fifty thousand manuscripts, the details of its history, are crumbling in the British Museum alone; the forms of Milton and Cromwell alone tower rugged and familiar. The rubbish flung upon Cromwell—ideal Puritan and forefather of liberty—has about decayed; we see him for the first at full size.

In English speech there has been but one master of "a great and perfect style"—John Milton. Our critics agree in this, and agree that we have no hope of another. Milton thought himself born an age too late to write a great poem; Macaulay sanctions and emphasizes this. We can see as a people no more the glowing visions of childhood. Spenser saw them as the child itself sees; Shakespeare saw them with the wild, undisciplined delight of riotous youth; Milton saw them with the steady head of mature life and the chaste eyes of a deep faith; but he saw them vanishing—the day of scientific research, practical, cold, critical, was at hand.

Within a generation Milton has ceased to be a popular author and has become a classic only. Macaulay could repeat "Paradise Lost;" Canon Farrar could finish, in his boyhood, the poem from any given verse; John Bright knew but two models for his manly eloquence—Milton and the Bible. A few years since the great poem adorned the center table of every intelligent religious family. To-day the schoolboy knows Milton only from a few pages in a text-book of literature. The weird and grotesque genius of Doré prolongs a decaying popularity in the household. Only scholars read, and they seldom quote. Milton will receive reverence and critical study; but the popular favor is gone. His style was modeled on the classics in the day when it was almost worship for a studious man to open a Greek tragedy or Latin oration. This homage has ceased. The causes that led to it are no longer in operation. The devout reverence for the ancient classics can no more belong to our day than fauns and satyrs can invade our forests.

But, aside from style and smaller matters that turn the popular mind away, is the great fact that the theology of Milton is not for us. It belongs to a yesterday—passed but very near. It was buried as Henry VIII was buried; with profound admiration for strength and great services, but with no tears. Milton was not a theologian in his first thought. The day when the Westminster Catechism was given birth was a time of doctrinal peace—a Roman peace, perhaps—but there was little critical or speculative thought on doctrines. The volcano that buried the English throne burst forth from religious fires, but they were kindled by questions of church government, not of doctrine. Bishop, pope, presbyter, league and covenant, were the watchwords, while the theology of Geneva ruled with little question over both parties. Our hard questions were unasked—almost unheard of then. In the ponderous prose volumes of Milton one searches in vain for argument on the existence of God, divinity of Christ, inspiration of Scripture, or immortality. His theological system was a stern and colossal structure, a mediæval castle built on bare, overjutting rocks—built for storms and siege and victory. The massive foundation stones are Hebraic; the general plan is Roman; every ponderous archway, every tower, hall, or chamber bears the impress of St. Augustine. The material is Anglo-Saxon, coarse and firm; the decoration, rich and chaste, is Greek. The Latin essay on Christian doctrine, found in 1823 among state papers, shows views somewhat heterodox—the eternity of matter and a rather Arian notion of Christ; his liberal Sabbath and divorce views were well known. Our wonder is that a scholar so wide in range, a man so ready to abandon precedent and heap scorn upon throne, altar, and cathedral, so haughty and lonely a mind, accepted implicitly theology as he found it. We would expect one so self-centered and mighty as the author of Areopagitica, whose only church was his own chamber, whose only choir was his own voice and organ, whose only worship was his own meditation and prayer, whose only liturgy was his Hebrew Bible, to anticipate the theological movements of a century, as Coleridge did; but he did not.

Milton's God is a monarch seated always upon a throne in unapproachable majesty. The throne is iron; no poetic splendors can gild it. His decrees go forth like the laws of Draco;

he is cold, just, jealous, and terrible. The czar in his arsenal-palace, hurling to Siberian gloom his wayward subjects, is as attractive to our hearts as the One who, "in the pure empyrean sits high-throned above all height," in Milton's "Paradise." "Father," the word of unspeakable meaning to Christian hearts —full of hope and comfort, inviting the weak, the weary, the sinful, to look up to his face, to return to his arms—this name is not known to the angels who shout in the high-domed halls from which every murmurer has been hurled by thunder-bolts of wrath. About the old Jove there was a certain grim humor and benevolent smile that made him at times approachable—even lovable—to men. The Hebrew prophet never forgot the mercy that endureth forever as an attribute of Jehovah. In this noblest majesty of English speech, sublime as the deep roll of the sea, the throne is radiant in pure light; but as we behold it we shiver. The very light is cold as white marble; the dreadful caricature of God is the corner stone of a theology that frowns like the tower of London or the old French bastile.

Milton's Christ is an official Saviour. His mission begins in a Roman court of justice; his incarnate life is perfunctory. The Jesus of Nazareth who was the friend and brother of fishermen, who went into the houses of men to win their personal love, who wept at Bethany, was a man of sorrows as well as of joy, who forgives at Calvary in words more tender than any mother's voice—this Jesus, who is every day winning his way deeper into the hearts of men in these last years, is a far different person from the calm, dignified, resigned prince of "Paradise Lost" or "Paradise Regained." None of the hymns that form the choral parts of the great poem could give way to "Jesus, lover of my soul." The harps of these warrior angels could not be tuned to such melody. Whoever doubts progress in theology let him read Milton, then the conception of Christ drawn from living writers; and be thankful that the stately figure who in the former comes from heaven to earth to live and die is not the Christ of our intellects or the Christ of our hearts.

Satan is the strong character—easily the hero of "Paradise Lost"—our hearts follow him as such. But if this scornful and wayward outcast solve the problem of evil as finding a fulcrum outside God's government on which evil may rest its lever, the success is only poetical. Milton's Satan is the boldest figure clothed in black ever propelled from the human brain. He rises in awful majesty between the grotesque, rollicking devil of the middle ages and the mysterious force called evil by the science of to-day. Over all devils, from Persian Ahriman to Mephistopheles, Milton's Satan sits chief as easily as ever:

> Millions of spirits for his fault amerced
> Of heaven, and from eternal splendors flung
> . . . . . .
> He above the rest
> In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
> Stood like a tower.

Theology now does not embody its evil in this form with the same confidence; rather, it does not dogmatize. It does not shrink from the fact, but reverently declares that "All mysteries run into one; the mystery of mysteries is evil." Milton's Satan leads us not a step out of the labyrinth.

Artists, struggle as they may, can paint no face of Christ that has not the outlines of that face into which Raphael emptied his genius. Nor can we give, by any flight of imagination, to Mary the mother of Jesus a face that does not resemble the Italian Madonnas. So long have these faces been gazed upon reverently that they have authority over us. They seem to have history behind them—to be portraits; they bind us against our reason. In the same way the hell, the Satan, the angels of Milton fettered the imagination till it seemed dangerous to refuse entire belief in them. "Paradise Lost" was accepted so long as an appendix to the Bible, a new apocalypse, that it became a part of English belief. The creation over which science and religion battled was more of Milton than of Genesis. The hell of the Edwardian preaching drew its horrors far more from Milton than from the sublime warnings in Matthew. As the orthodoxy of Milton was not questioned in his day, save on divorce—as his genius rose to companionship with Homer and Dante—his gorgeous pageantry of heaven, and his entire scenic unfolding of that

> Dismal situation, waste and wild;
> A dungeon horrible! On all sides round,
> As one great furnace, flamed
> A fiery deluge, fed
> With everburning sulphur unconsumed—set forth with such authority were accepted as true. The desire for knowledge of the things beyond was never met half so grandly. Few stopped to ask upon what meager text of Scripture he seized for corner stone for this coarse materialism, these dungeons of inquisitorial torture and palaces of tedious delight.

Theology has little direct interest in Milton now; his iron hand is relaxed; it clutches no longer; its impress can never disappear, but only the historian will know it. He is a landmark, not a guidepost; a monument, not a light-house.

The keynote of this great oratorio is will. God is to be forever adored because he alone is able to enforce his will. He is supremely happy because he alone of all beings is able to have his own way. Christ sinks to a subordinate, almost uninteresting character in the poem, because he sinks his own will in the Father's. No adoring epithets as the poem proceeds can supply this deficiency, so strong has Milton made it. Between the lines we read that his conduct is noble, but hardly godlike. Satan is consistent with this first law of Milton's heaven:

> What though the field be lost?
> All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
> And study of revenge, immortal hate,
> And courage never to submit or yield,
> And what is else not to be overcome.

There is at first no desire for dark things, no refusal of holiness: he simply wants to rule. This is the music of a great oratorio, but air, chorus, recitative are all played on the one key, will. Minor strains are often introduced, righteousness, justice, love, but they are kept sternly subordinate; over them all the naked will rises as first attribute of Deity. On every page is seen the hand of the haughty Englishman. This is the man who brings his wife to his feet, not to his heart; who chides his daughters in his dying words; who storms at all opposition, in Church or State, with words that strike like the broadswords and pikes of the Ironside Legion. It is a Norse giant who has laid his hand on the Gospel. We may believe Carlyle, that this day was the last appearance of the heroic in England.

Art. VII.—HEZEKIAH, SARGON, AND SENNACHERIB—A CHRONOLOGICAL STUDY.

It is the purpose of the following discussion to show the substantial agreement and accuracy of the biblical and Assyrian accounts for a period covering part of the reign of Hezekiah, Sargon, and Sennacherib, thereby affording a justification of the biblical date of Sennacherib's first invasion of Judea as in the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah, and supplying a chronological arrangement of the related events of that period.

In 2 Kings xviii, 13, and Isa. xxxvi, 1, etc., the first attack of Sennacherib upon the kingdom of Judah is dated in Hezekiah's fourteenth year. In the chronicler's account (2 Chron. xxxii, 1) no date is given. That date, by some set down as a copyist's blunder, by others as having crept in from the margin, has been a source of perplexity, since it is said to be unusual to make such a note of time in these books. Thus Canon Rawlinson, in Note B, on 2 Kings xviii, 13, writes: "Notice of the regnal years of an ordinary invasion is not in the manner of the writer of Kings. He dates the last attack on Samaria and its capture, the last attack on Jerusalem and its capture. But he does not date the invasion of Shishak, or Ben-hadad, or Hazael, or Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, or the first attack of Shalmaneser, or the invasion of Necho, or the first or second attack of Nebuchadnezzar. What should induce him to date this attack, which, if it were distinct from the Libnah and Lachish expedition of chapter xix, 8–36, was of no special importance? But if he did not date it, a scribe, noticing the dates in verses 9 and 10, may have wished to supply what seemed to him an omission. Taking the first words of chapter xx ('in those days') strictly, and confounding together two expeditions of Sennacherib, he may have thought to obtain the correct date from 2 Chron. xx, 6." What "two expeditions" he might have "confounded together" are not named, and would seem difficult, if not impossible, to be identified. But if it was not customary with the writer whose work he was copying to note the "regnal years," the scribe would most certainly know this as well as any later critic; and one may well wonder how this could seem "to him an omission," and what could "induce" the scribe to wish "to supply" what his author was not accustomed to insert; and more especially is the scribe's action matter of astonishment on that theory if one cannot see "what should induce" the author to insert a date. If this expedition were of no special importance it can hardly be supposed that the copyist would interpolate, in this solitary instance, and against his author's custom, a date for which, on this hypothesis, he had no foundation save a mere guess, and that founded upon historic ignorance or confusion. And this necessarily assumes that there was but one copy or copyist, or that all scribes who copied the original were seized with the same desire to supply the omission, and, unlike our modern "redactors," all agreed upon the same date—a most remarkable case of agreement, if the date be not the true one, and written upon positive knowledge. At another time this hypothesis would seem to fail utterly, as it seems impossible thereby to account for the appearance of the date in Isaiah.

Is it not much more likely that this variation from the writer's usual custom indicates that the date was given for some other purpose than merely for the fixing of the date for all the succeeding narrative? May it not suggest that the date given is of the nature of an epoch, as the date of the first hostile movement of the Assyrians against the Jewish kingdom and of the first appearance of Sennacherib in Judea might well be; it being, doubtless, in the same or following year as that to which Isaiah had reference, when Sargon sent Tartan to Ashdod (xx, 1), and when Isaiah had the vision which foretold the victory which three years afterward the Assyrians would gain over the Egyptian and Ethiopian allies of the Jews? May it not be understood as the date of that expedition resulting in the capture of the fenced cities and the second taking of Ashdod by the Sargonidæ? and the fickleness and revolts of which resulted in desolating invasions of southern Palestine?

Taking for our guide the inscriptions of Sargon,* it is found that in "the second year" of Sargon's reign (720 or 719) Ilubid of Hamath had "established himself in the town of Qarqar, and excited against" Sargon "the towns Arpad, Simyra, Damas, and Samaria." This confederacy Sargon seems to have overcome, and then, marching southward, he met the Egyptians under So, or Sebech, at Raphia, and completely routed them. He then besieged Gaza, seized Hanun, its king, demolished his cities, "burning them by fire." The plunder, with nine thousand and thirty-three captives, he carried to Assyria. The unfortunate loss of forty lines of the inscription describing this expedition leaves us without other information as to its results; but for reasons which may below appear, it may be assumed that, as with the army he traversed, both in his advance and his victorious return, the plain bordering on the Mediterranean, the cities therein, among which were Ashdod, Gimzo, and Askelon, were either forcibly taken or submitted to his arms and became tributary vassals. This seems to follow from the fact that at that time he extended his conquests as far as the island of Cyprus, which in his thirteenth year he charges with having "refused their contributions," * which, through the fear inspired by his (Sargon's) victory over Merodach-baladan, they then began again to pay. It is absurd to suppose that he would undertake the conquest of an island in the sea until he had brought under his power the people on the mainland, from whose ports his soldiers must have embarked, and where he must have kept open the way for his and their return.

From subsequent notices it would seem that "Azuri, King of Ashdod," had "made up his mind not to be obedient to Asshur, and not to supply any more his tributes. He sent to the kings, his neighbors, hostile messages to Assyria. Then I (Sargon) meditated vengeance, and I replaced him" (that is, put him out and put another in his place), "in the domination of his lands. I elevated to his place his brother, Akhimit, to the royalty. But the people of Syria inclined to revolt, and were tired of the government of Akhimit, and elevated Iaman, who, like him, was not the legitimate master of the throne." † Furious with rage, Sargon marched against Iaman and Ashdod, and took it and Gimt-ashdodim, which he gave up to plunder. From all this it seems plain that Ashdod had been made tributary, with Azuri as king, in Sargon's Raphia campaign (720–719); that in a short time Azuri, forming alliances with neighboring kings, had revolted. He was then deposed and his brother Akhimit made ruler. He in turn was dethroned by the populace, and Iaman made ruler in his stead. We may now determine when Azuri was deposed and Akhimit was enthroned.

In the latter part of his seventh year Sargon is known to have been in the west, and "while the rulers near Palestine were anxious to gain his friendship" * there is no evidence that he was at that time in the Jewish territory or in southwest Palestine. But there are not wanting indications that he had sent at that very time a considerable force into the immediate neighborhood of that territory. It is, indeed, stated in his annals that he sent that year from Arabia into Samaria the captives whom he had "pulled out of their dwellings," and that "Pharaoh of Egypt, Samsie the Queen of Arabia, Itamar the Sabean, kings of the far seaside, sent (him) tributes," among other things "horses and camels," † all which indicates the successful presence of a large force inspiring these nations with fear—a force such as that which the leaders, who (we suggest) were the Tartan and (or) Sennacherib, must have commanded in their convoy. ‡ There is, in fact, no other expedition mentioned in Sargon's history which at all accounts for Isa. xx, 1. It is further significant of the presence of this force that in the Khorsabad inscriptions he states that he imposed (that is, it was done by his authority) this tribute upon Pharaoh, Samsie, and Itamar. It is, perhaps, due to the fact that Sargon did not command in person that the conquest of Ashdod is not named in the annals of his seventh or eighth year, but a previous expedition in which that conquest had been effected is indicated in the annals of his eleventh year (711–710), where, as in part above quoted, the following record is found:

> Azuri, King of Ashdod, made up his mind not to be obedient to Asshur, and not to supply any more his tributes. He sent to the kings, his neighbors, hostile messages to Assyria. Then I meditated vengeance, and I replaced him in the domination of his lands. I elevated in his place his brother Akhimit to the royalty. But the people of Syria inclined to revolt, and were tired of the government of Akhimit and elevated Iaman, who, like him, was not the legitimate master of the throne. In the wrath of my heart I did not divide my army, and I did not diminish the ranks, but I marched against Ashdod with my warriors, who did not separate themselves from the traces of my sandals.§

* Smith's Assyria, p. 104.
† Records of the Past, vol. vii, p. 34.
‡ Ibid., vol. ix, p. 5.
§ Ibid., vol. vii, p. 40.

The expression italicized can scarcely be otherwise interpreted than as indicating that he had formerly divided his forces in a similar case and separated them from "traces of his sandals" (his footsteps), and that the meditated vengeance had been consummated, Azuri deposed, and Akhimit enthroned by that part of his forces which had been detached from the main army and had followed another leader. This division of his forces in the case of Azuri agrees with Isaiah's statement that he sent the Tartan to Ashdod,* and fully accounts for the submission of the "far seaside"† and the tribute above named.

Now this 7th-8th of Sargon falls in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, and the presence of Sennacherib and his taking of the fenced cities would account for this overthrow of Azuri and the making of Akhimit, King of Ashdod, in his stead. This also would agree, as above suggested, with the epochal statement of Isaiah: "In the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod (when Sargon, the King of Assyria, sent him) and fought against Ashdod and took it." From the context in Isaiah the fair inference is that this sending was three years before the expedition of Sargon, which broke up the confederacy formed by the Ashdodites under the popular usurper, Iaman, with Moab and Edom, assisted by help and encouraged by large promises from Egypt.‡

Putting all this together, we have an order of events which completely reconciles the two accounts, the one, indeed, supplementing the other. It indicates a first conquest of Ashdod by Sargon in person after his victory over the Egyptians at Raphia (720–719), at which time Azuri of Ashdod was confirmed in his kingdom. The revolt of Azuri and his confederates, which brought against him a detachment of Sargon's army under a Tartan, or commander (in all probability Sennacherib, "his great royal son"), resulted in a second or reconquest of Ashdod, and in the placing of Akhimit as a ruler on the throne of the deposed Azuri in 714–713, and in the conquest of the "fenced cities" of Hezekiah in his fourteenth year. This was followed by another revolt of southwest Palestine, with Ashdod, under Iaman, as instigator, comprising in the league Judea, Edom, Moab, and a force of Egyptians and Ethiopians.§ In his eleventh year (711–710) Sargon crushed out this confederacy, recaptured

§ Ibid.

Ashdod, and took Gimt-ashdodim and the plunder of the cities. This, as may be seen, was just three years after the assumed reconquest of Ashdod by the Tartan and (or) Sennacherib.*

This suppression of the revolt by Sargon demonstrated the groundlessness of any hope of substantial help to Judea from Egypt and Ethiopia. In referring to this alliance Sargon says:

> The people (of the confederacy) and their evil chiefs to fight against me, unto Pharaoh, King of Egypt, a monarch who could not save them, their presents carried and besought his alliance.†

When the confederacy collapsed Iaman fled to Egypt, and thence continued his flight to Meroe, or Ethiopia, from whence he was afterward surrendered to Sargon, thus confirming the statement that in the defeated army were both Egyptians and Ethiopians hotly pursued by Sargon's troops, their loss in the flight being very great. The vivid picture drawn by Isaiah ‡ is thereby shown not to be an exaggeration.

Thus the insertion of this date, the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, like the similar and contemporaneous mention of Sargon by Isaiah, serves to bring out and explain the reference to this revolt in the southwest, and is in perfect harmony with the Assyrian inscriptions. It is difficult to see why the date three years later may not be taken as the year when the expedition referred to by Isaiah, which, as we learn from the monuments, had for its chief objects Ashdod, Egypt, and Ethiopia, was entered upon, and which evidently resulted in the reconquering of many cities then subject to the Jewish king, some of which are expressly named—a result which, indeed, must have occurred in every invasion. Whatever may have been accomplished against the Judean territory in this expedition, and whatever may have been Sargon's ultimate purpose as to its capital, he does not appear at that time to have done more than threaten Jerusalem, which accords well with the idea that his chief objects of attack were Ashdod, Egypt, and Ethiopia.

If our conjecture is right, the real purpose underlying the expedition colonizing Samaria was, first, that revealed by Isaiah as against Ashdod; Sennacherib and (or) Tartan having disposed of the captives in Samaria, passed down, as purposed by Sargon, to the southwest, capturing the cities in the march, subjugating the Shephelah, and, having taken rebellious Ashdod and its ungrateful ruler, Azuri, set up his brother, Akhimit, as vassal king. In the disabilities in which the Jewish king was found the less important "fenced cities," though well fortified, without a leader, and most likely taken by surprise, would fall an easy prey to the Assyrian forces, flushed as they were with their recent brilliant successes elsewhere. But a stronger army and greater preparation, as well as a longer time, would certainly be necessary to take the capital city, held to be almost impregnable both by its natural advantage of situation and the strength added by the fortifications erected for its defense.

The expedition of Sargon in his eleventh year, while, as we have seen, it broke up the confederacy, like that of the Tartan (Sennacherib) above, seems, as before stated, not to have reached Jerusalem. There is no claim that he either subjugated it or even made an attack upon it, or upon what had previously been left under the dominion of Hezekiah. His effort in that campaign seems to have been directed simply to regain what had been lost in the revolt and to restore his prestige and authority. That he would have omitted to record so notable a conquest as the taking of a strong and important city like Jerusalem is utterly incredible when contrasted with his boastfulness over lesser exploits. There is no indication that a later expedition was made by Sargon, and he seems never afterward to have been in the west, either in northern or southern Palestine. As he did not personally appear in the matters which immediately affected the kingdom of Judah in the expedition made three years earlier under the Tartan (Sennacherib), and as the results were only the punishment of Azuri and the restoration of what he had previously in person subjugated, results which, however important to Hezekiah, yet added little more to his (Sargon's) glory—the possibility of the revolt and its actual recurrence rather detracting therefrom—but redounded to the credit of the Tartan (his son), no specific mention is made of them in his annals; * so also his name is omitted in this condensed biblical history, that of Sennacherib alone appearing, he probably being "co-rex," with his father, as he is called in Tablet K, 2169, "the Rabshakeh," and the "great royal son of Sargon, King of Assyria," a title assumed by Assurbanipal when associated with his father on the throne.*

* The expedition under the Tartan may have taken two years, and this may account for the putting of the date "ninth year" to what made necessary the expedition in the "eleventh year."—Ep. Can., pp. 129, 174.

As further showing that neither the writer of Second Kings nor of Second Chronicles in this matter gave the events in the order of their dates, the account of Hezekiah's sickness may be adduced. This, in Kings,† follows the account of the destruction of the host; and yet the promise to add to the life of the king fifteen years, thus extending his reign to its actual term of twenty-nine years, proves the sickness to have occurred in his fourteenth regnal. So, also, it is evident that the embassy of Merodach-baladan was received not later than the year after, perhaps in that very year, since the pretexts were, according to Isaiah,‡ his late sickness and remarkable recovery. This view receives further support from the charge made by Sargon§ in Hezekiah's eighteenth year, that Merodach was striving to raise against him all the nomad tribes, evidently making all the alliances that he could to overturn the Assyrian power. Still, additional indication of the date suggested is the showing to the ambassadors the great riches and resources, which certainly he could not have had after the immense tribute had been paid to the Assyrian king.

The account in Second Chronicles‖ seems also to add support to this hypothesis. It gives no date, but following the account of Hezekiah's reform, says: "After these things, and the establishment thereof, Sennacherib, King of Assyria, came and entered into Judah, and encamped against the fenced cities, and thought to win them to himself"—an expression which seems to indicate that his "winning them" was only a temporary achievement, and did not permanently attach them to him, exactly corresponding with what, if our supposition be right, appears from their being reported in revolt in a year or two afterward. The chronicler then proceeds to give an account of Hezekiah's preparations to resist the expected attack, and concludes with the statement that, after hearing Hezekiah's exhortation and assurances that "with him" (the Assyrian) "is an arm of flesh, but with us is the Lord our God to help us, and to fight our battles," the "people rested themselves upon the words of Hezekiah, King of Judah." All this seems to indicate that at this time, as before said, Sennacherib did not attack Jerusalem but turned aside, and after taking Ashdod and the fenced cities put over them governors well affected toward Assyria, as was the custom of Sargon; for example, such as Padi, King of Ekron, and then returned to Nineveh. It seems at this time that Hezekiah maintained his independence, and was neither asked nor volunteered to pay tribute. If this was but a detachment from the main army it possibly was not strong enough to undertake the siege of the capital city. The indications are that both after this departure of Sennacherib and the subsequent recapture of Ashdod by Sargon, Hezekiah took advantage of their absence and repossessed himself of that part of his dominions which had been thus temporarily wrested from him, the people, in all likelihood, gladly returning to their allegiance to him. The chronicler, but still regardless of dates, next proceeds with the information that, "After this did Sennacherib, King of Assyria, send his servants to Jerusalem," but himself and his principal force "laid siege against Lachish." This, we suggest, refers to an expedition at a later date; and referring to Sennacherib's own account of his campaigns we find the history of an invasion of Palestine which is fixed in his fourth year, the twenty-seventh year of Hezekiah's reign, B. C. 701. In this expedition, after subjugating Phœnicia and most of Philistia, he marched against Ekron (or, as some read, Migron), to assist which a force under the King of Egypt came up. The two armies met near Altaqu, or Eltekah. The battle resulted in the defeat of the Africans and the subsequent capture of Ekron and Altaqu.

It was at this time that Hezekiah, losing confidence at the approach of so powerful an enemy in the flush of victory, yielded to the demands for the release of Padi, the imprisoned King of Ekron, and at the same time made the overture to pay whatever tribute might be put upon him, and which, being paid, seems for a time to have satisfied the wily and rapacious Assyrian. To the account given by Sennacherib of this expedition the Bible adds the siege and capture of Lachish and the encampment at Libnah. Comparing the royal and biblical accounts it is readily seen that the real objective point of Sennacherib in this expedition was Egypt, and that the siege of Lachish and the effort to secure the control of Hezekiah and Jerusalem were undertaken with a view to clearing his way, and securing himself from any attack in the rear. The biblical account omits some of the matters which the annals give, but supplies in part the account of the siege of Lachish, and the subsequent encampment at Libnah, thus accounting for the existence of an exhumed bas-relief which depicts this siege, and exhibits Sennacherib on his throne before Lachish, the only Assyrian intimation so far discovered of this adventure. This siege of Lachish must have continued for a considerable time, and it is probable that the events which the king describes in his annals may have taken place during its progress. Lachish and Libnah were doubtless numbered with the forty-six cities which the annals tell us were at this time taken in Judea; and this was perhaps considered sufficient. The successes claimed, especially the battle with the Egyptians and their allies at Altaqu, may well explain, as before suggested, why Hezekiah consented to pay the tribute as represented in both the annals and the biblical account, which substantially agree in this matter. The annals represent the battle as having been fought before the tribute was paid, and if Sennacherib intended to push his forces into Egypt it is possible that while endeavoring to subdue Lachish, so as not to leave that stronghold in the hands of an enemy, he may also have seen that it was not safe to leave so powerful a tributary as the Jewish king, known to be an unwilling vassal, in a position to endanger his line of communication and retreat, or to cut off his supplies; and this desire to have the rear of his army secure from attack and his way kept open, may have been the incentive to the demand for the immediate and unconditional surrender of Jerusalem to him. We thus account for what otherwise seems strange, that so soon after the voluntary offer of vassalage and the payment of an immense tribute by Hezekiah, a force, evidently from Lachish, should have been dispatched against him and his capital, imperatively demanding its surrender, the great king meantime continuing to besiege Lachish.

For some unexplained reason, but perhaps to be nearer to Jerusalem, and yet at the same time to be near enough to easily keep open and under his own immediate surveillance the road to Egypt, and to complete his arrangements for its invasion, Lachish having doubtless been taken, as seems to be clearly intimated by the bas-relief, the king had moved with his army to Libnah, where Rabshakeh hastened to report his ill success with the Jews. While there a rumor reached the great king that another force from the south, under the command of Tirhakah,* the Ethiopian, was advancing northward against him, and while the king made preparations to meet the approaching foe, messengers with a letter were sent in haste to urge with greater importunity and violence the immediate surrender of the Jewish capital, the messengers, the more effectively to accomplish their purpose, appealing directly to the populace, and hurling defiance and blasphemy against their Jehovah. From the Egyptian accounts we gather the indication that an Assyrian force, perhaps an outpost or reconnoitering detachment, had been sent southward, and had reached as far as Pelusium. It was there face to face with the approaching Africans. Meantime the demands and insults of the Assyrians were received with profoundly sad and solemn silence at Jerusalem. They soon met a most fearful response and retribution; for that very night, before Tirhakah had come up with the main army or encampment of the Assyrians, "the angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrian a hundred and fourscore and five thousand, and when they" (the survivors) "arose early in the morning, behold, they" (the one hundred and fourscore and five thousand) "were all dead corpses."† The Egyptians claim that the loss was sustained as the armies faced each other near Pelusium, while Josephus places it in the camp at Jerusalem, the Bible saying "the camp of the Assyrians" without designating where. But may not the truth be that the angel of destruction fell upon the camp at Libnah, where the main army was, and also at Jerusalem, distributing the fatality in each of the separate divisions of what formed one great encampment, so that each division was rendered incapable of effective aggression or resistance, and was thoroughly demoralized, thus agreeing with the Egyptian accounts as given by Herodotus, and that of Josephus, as to the loss at Jerusalem, as well as with the biblical narrative, which simply says, "in the camp of the Assyrians"—that is, where the Assyrians were, without closer definition as to location.

We may now give a further consideration to the biblical narrative. It has already been suggested that the statement in 2 Kings xviii, 13, relative to the fourteenth of Hezekiah, was not intended to give a date for the subsequent events in the sense that they immediately followed, but that it referred only to the campaign when the fenced cities were taken; that this, indeed, was of the nature of an epoch, as being the first appearance of Sennacherib in Judea. It has also seemed probable that Sennacherib, who was also called Rabshakeh, was himself Sargon's Tartan, or as co-rex accompanied the Tartan in the expedition to Ashdod to which Isaiah (xx, 1) refers, and that the fenced cities were then taken, and a purpose shown to take Jerusalem.

Turning now to the text (2 Kings xviii, 13), there can be no question but that the preterite or perfect tense of the verb used will allow the translation,* "Now in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah, Sennacherib, King of Assyria, had come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and had taken them." It was, therefore, after that had been accomplished, that Hezekiah offered and paid tribute. How long afterward is nowhere stated in the biblical accounts. That the tribute was, however, paid to Sennacherib during his own sole reign, after his father's death, seems fairly evident from the Assyrian records.

With this interpretation of the passage in Kings the account in 2 Chron. xxxii, 1–9, perfectly coincides. It is there stated that when Sennacherib encamped against the fenced cities and showed a purpose to fight against Jerusalem, Hezekiah made vigorous preparations for the defense of his capital; and neither he nor his people manifested any disposition to yield to the "kings of Assyria," but rather trusted themselves and their defense to Jehovah and their own preparations. To this follows the indefinite statement: "After this did Sennacherib, King of Assyria, send his servants to Jerusalem (but he himself laid siege against Lachish, and all his power with him), unto Hezekiah, King of Judah, and unto all Judah that were at Jerusalem." How long it was after Hezekiah had fortified the city, and encouraged his people to hold out against the Assyrian, that Sennacherib laid siege to Lachish is not stated, and we are not, therefore, shut up to the conclusion, nor is it probable that this siege of Lachish was contemporaneous with the taking of the fenced cities in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah; but it is positively stated that the siege was in progress during his last attempt upon Jerusalem. To establish this we have the concurrent testimony of Kings and Chronicles and Isaiah, with the collateral evidence of the bas-relief above mentioned.

The question may, however, be asked, If the fenced cities were taken during Sargon's reign, why does the Bible attribute that exploit to Sennacherib, and why is he there called King of Assyria? To the first question an answer has already been suggested, namely, because he was the most conspicuous actor, and we may now add the best known and most dreaded actor, in the siege and capture of these cities. Two reasons may be given for his being designated King of Assyria. It is clearly evident that the biblical record was written some time after these events had taken place, and at a time when Sennacherib had reigned, or was then reigning, as sole King of Assyria. There is, therefore, nothing unnatural in his using a title which he afterward possessed in his sole right, and which in all probability he bore when the writing was made. But there is not wanting that which goes far to confirm the suggestion above made, that he was at the time of the capture of the Judean cities co-rex, associate king, that in fact the Assyrian kingdom had at that time two kings, the father and the "great royal son." Such a dual executive was not at all unusual in the ancient Oriental monarchies, nor is this the only instance in the Assyrian history. This, perhaps, occasioned, or at least may account for and explain, the peculiar expression found in 2 Chron. xxxii, 4, where the people whom Hezekiah had mustered "to stop the waters of the fountains which were without the city," are reported as saying, "For why should the kings of Assyria come and find much water?" If it was, as we have supposed, a detachment of the Assyrian forces under the son-king that was then operating in the Jewish territory against the lesser cities, and was purposing "to fight against Jerusalem" also—then, as such a detachment might be supposed insufficient to carry out the purposed capture of the capital city, nothing is more likely than that they should expect that there would be a concentration of the entire forces by the father-king joining the son in the siege and assault upon their city; and their preparations were made to resist, not the King at the head of his detachment, but the two kings with their concentrated military power. Such a concentration of forces would have been greatly helped by finding "much water," and without it could hardly have succeeded in reducing the city.

It may be necessary to guard against the mistaken opinion that the taking of the "forty-six of his (Hezekiah's) cities," which Sennacherib claims in his account of his last disastrous campaign in Judea, was identical with the taking of the cities referred to in the Bible. This taking of the cities has either not been recorded by the Assyrian king, or the inscription has perished in the mutilations which so largely occur in Sargon's voluminous remains, unless it is to this he refers in the inscription found on the Kouyunjik Cylinder, as "in his ninth year"—a statement which may indicate that the operations in southwest Palestine (which could not have been carried on by Sargon himself in person, since he was at the time elsewhere),* covered a period of at least two years, and were ended only by the campaign which is noted as in his eleventh year, and which he conducted in person.

It had been the thought of the writer hereof that the terribly disastrous ending of his last Judean campaign had caused Sennacherib to yield to the temptation to cover it up, and to turn defeat into victory by crediting to that expedition the exploits and successes in the invasion which he had made in the time of Sargon, his father. But on further and later consideration it seems mere wantonness to charge a crime where other more satisfactory and honorable explanations are as likely to be true. There is nothing incredible in the statement that in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, by Sargon's orders, his son as Tartan and co-rex, or with the Tartan, invaded Judea and took the fenced cities. And certainly there can be no possible reason for doubting that up to the night before the avenging interposition of Jehovah the Judean cities and territories were in possession of the Assyrians, so that in themselves neither statement is incredible, the one as referring to the earlier, the other to the last invasion by Sennacherib. It is to be set to the credit of Sennacherib that the actual record of even this most unfortunate invasion, as far as it goes, tells nothing incredible or certainly untrue, but is for the most part either directly or incidentally confirmed to the letter by what is learned from other sources. He simply follows the Oriental custom in his day of giving so much of his story as is creditable to him, and leaving out any account of defeats or disasters.

It ought not, perhaps, to be overlooked that up to the exhumation of the Assyrian ruins, which brought to light the cuneiform inscriptions and their subsequent interpretation, the period which it was therein found had been covered by the reign of Sargon was, so far as its history was known, included in the years allotted to the reign of Sennacherib. By some unexplained mischance this king, whose reign was one of the most glorious of Assyrian monarchs, was wholly lost to profane history, and until these later years we were indebted solely for his very name to that "crux" of the commentator, Isa. xx, 1. That with this solitary exception it should wholly disappear, and his regnal years be counted to his son's less splendid and successful career, is perhaps unaccountable, but is not, therefore, necessarily the fault either of his son or his successors. The preservation of his name by Isaiah ought, however, to accredit the biblical writers as historians who wrote from actual knowledge, and should cause credence in other statements which may not as yet have been verified. In all apparently doubtful cases the presumption ought always to be in their favor, and not against them.

The obscuration of the Ninevite records, the hiding of these inscriptions in the dust of ages, seems providential. Their recovery could not have happened more opportunely than in this age of educated faith and yet of persistent doubt. If in comparing the biblical with these narratives disagreements should seem to appear, it were better to make sure that there can be no other way of disposing of these differences than by pronouncing one or other of the records to be erroneous. Possibly the error may be in our deduction and application—a misunderstanding of the record rather than an error in the record itself. It is certainly unwise in the biblicist needlessly to discredit these records of the past, written authoritatively by those who certainly had better opportunities of knowing what occurred in their day, or the period nearer to them, than are likely to be afforded to any who lived in a later age; and until further evidence of untrustworthiness in these "witnesses from the dust" is found, it will be well not to discredit them, but rather to assume their substantial verity. And what we say of these we affirm with still greater confidence of Holy Scripture, which has so often been pronounced untrustworthy in matters historical and afterward found to be remarkably accurate when the material for verification had come "out of darkness into light."

With a chronological conspectus this paper now concludes:

Art. VIII.—THE ÆSTHETIC IN RELIGION.

The Greeks used the term æsthetics to denote everything relating to sensuous perception. In his Transcendental Æsthetics Kant retains this meaning. Many German writers limit its meaning to fine arts and a limited class of perceptions and sensations arising out of the beautiful. So Baumgarten tells us, that as truth is the end of pure knowledge, and good the end of the will, so beauty must be the aim of all sensuous knowledge.

The Question Stated Philosophically.

We may approach this study by two methods. The one is the metaphysical, the other, the scientific. The first, reasons from cause to effect, and speculation centers about the object admired. The second, inquires rather in what the beautiful consists, and whether it is objective, subjective, or both. Is beauty inherent in material forms, or is it above matter, and if so, how is it revealed to the beholder? What principle beautifies matter? Leveque holds that it is vivified by some force. Plato says, beauty grows from self-existent forms superinduced upon matter. Reid holds that divine energy invests matter with beautiful aspects. Leveque is apparently pantheistic; Plato and Hegel materialistic; and Reid more nearly theistic, along with Ruskin and Shaftesbury.

We are admonished to keep in mind two aspects of art. First, art as a reproduction of nature. Second, art as the conscious product of æsthetic intuition. The absolute reveals itself to human intelligence by an appeal to our sense of the beautiful, while in art the mind seeks to imitate the beautiful in nature, and thus gropes after the thoughts of the absolute. Thus do we find a basis for the metaphysical in æsthetics.

Scientifically speaking, the subject and object in human cognition stand over against each other antithetically. The essence of beauty ceases to interest now, and its unity is disputed. Is it objective, or subjective? Burke, Aristotle, and Hogarth say it is objective; Alison says it is subjective; and Stuart, Bain, and Spencer say it is both. We incline to this last, though Herbert Spencer may not agree that if beauty in an object is not a result of mere reason, or cold intellectuality, it may be emotional also, and awaken awe and reverence. There may be a basis of truth in the apparently fanciful notions of Ruskin; this Mill grants. Socrates regarded the beautiful as related to the good, every object being beautiful if it served some rational end. Plato makes love aspire to the pure idea of beauty; only the absolute deserves the name beautiful; all other beauty is the beauty of things, not the beautiful itself. Aristotle is scientific rather than metaphysical. He ignores absolute beauty; distinguishes the beautiful from the good, since motionless things may have beauty, but the good is ever active. Plotinus, the mystic of Alexandria, has three degrees of the beautiful—the beauty of human reason, the beauty of the soul, and the beauty of real objects. Baumgarten says, logical knowledge deals with truth and æsthetical knowledge with beauty. The one is conceptive, the other is sensuous. In the apprehension of beauty sensuous knowledge is perfected, while the ugly struggles ever against the perfect. He but partially accounts for the emotional, which is the blood and soul of æsthetic sensation. Kant follows. He divides knowledge into, 1) the critique of pure reason; 2) the critique of practical reason; 3) the critique of judgment. He defines beauty by the four categories of quantity, quality, relation, and modality. In quantity we see the universality of the pleasure. In quality, the pleasure does not depend on the existence of the object. In relation we see adaptation, though no end is perceived. In modality we see the beautiful is a satisfaction; not by a universal rule, but by a kind of, or agreement of, taste. The loftiest meaning of beauty is to symbolize the good. Schelling gives us a threefold philosophy: 1) theoretic, dealing with perception; 2) practical, dealing with the will and freedom; 3) artistic, dealing with beauty. There must be concord between subject and object: concord lies between perception and volition, and is best seen in artistic perception. Nature produces objects unconsciously; art consciously reproduces them: art is above nature, therefore. We dissent.

Hegel insists on the philosophy of the absolute, or pure reason; the philosophy of nature, or thought broken up into the external and particular; and the philosophy of the spirit, in which thought is no longer self-alienated but self-cognizant, and is free from the mere ideality of cognition, and perceives the absolute idea. This has three stages: 1) Art presents the absolute to sensuous perception; 2) religion embodies certainty of the idea; 3) philosophy, in which art and religion find unity. However, matter is supreme in Oriental art, as if thought were struggling on in pain after the ideal, which is realized only in Christian art.

We might continue, with Vischer, Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, Taine, Batteaux, Cudworth, McCosh, and our own Bowne, of Boston. The field is enchanting. Rills break out about us and go purling on to the sea; the flowery mead invites us with beckoning banners of crimson and gold; but we forbear, and enter on part second of this study.

Religion, and How Related to Æsthetics.

In its broader sense the term religion means any form of worship. In a limited sense it means the worship of the one and only true God—the God of the Bible. In natural religion revelation is unimportant; in revealed religion nature takes second place, though many of us incline to nature-worship and pantheism in theological definition. The purposes of this paper will be best served if by religion we assume to mean Christianity. Religion makes its appeal to man's moral and spiritual nature, as logic does to the intellectual, and heat to the physical. Man worships; he ought to have the best form. Three great ethical religions contend for the possession of the soul—Buddhism, Islamism, and Christianity—and each is fitted for conquest because ethical. The chief hinderance to the first, is a one-sidedness caused by its Aryan origin; in the second, Semitic race tendencies hamper it; in the third, the element of universality is large, rendering it immeasurably higher than the others. The religion of the future must do substantial justice to dependence and liberty. Here the first and second break down, and the third fuses dependence and liberty, the divine and the human, religion and ethics, into an harmonious and symmetrical whole. There was an ancient faith before the fall; in every religion we see an effort to restore that primitive faith: Christianity restores it fully, subject to limitations of the flesh; evangelical Christianity is the highest embodiment of apostolic faith, and Methodism is the best type of evangelical life and thought.

With us religion is a life divine, implanted within us by divine agencies. Now, whatsoever will cultivate our spirit-nature is desirable. Religion, refinement, culture and love of music, poetry, and painting, appeal to the best that is in us. The sense of sight reveals a world of light and beauty; soft tints and shades from the prism interplay, and reveal to a lofty sense that color-world which is apprehended solely by beings soul-endowed. To its rich splendors the animal kingdom is blind. If this sense-perception of the beautiful fails to stir the spirit-nature of the beholder that nature is dead or dwarfed within him.

In like manner we enter the realm of tone by the sense of hearing. Musical appreciation grows out of such an arrangement of tones as produces in us pleasant sensations. Nature is musical; she appeals to the æsthetic taste; there are but few jarring discords and jagged sounds; the harmonies of a universe break in a perpetual oratorio upon the ear of the Infinite. But our ear-sense is dull, and much sublime minstrelsy is lost to us, though with deaf Beethoven we say, "I shall hear in heaven!"

In Aryan art, music, and poetry we see the religious spirit and the æsthetic taste joined. It is so in the song of the Vedic shepherds in the Himalayan region; and their poetry finds an echo in the sublime imagination of the Greeks: and as the notes die amidst the Indo-Germanic tribes of the far east, Chaucer renews the strains; then Goethe, Wordsworth, Scott, Bryant, Longfellow, Whittier, and Tennyson sing for us. So sings the Aryan heart in the Orient, in the Occident; and so it must sing in coming years, until all song ends in the richer numbers of a heavenly world.

The masterpieces in music, painting, and poetry are inspired by religion. In music, we have Haydn's best in "Creation;" and Mozart's "Requiem," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Handel's "Messiah," Schneiders "Deluge," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Crotch's "Palestine," and Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" are of the highest order.

What of painting? Three of the best by modern artists are Munckasy's "Christ Before Pilate," Millet's "Angelus," and Murillo's "Ascension." These have a value of over one hundred thousand dollars each, though it borders on sacrilege to bring in here sordid gold! Raphael's finest painting is the "Transfiguration;" his best mosaic, "God Creating the Stars;" his best statue, "Jonah." Rembrandt's best paintings are the "Marriage of Samson" and "Christ Healing the Sick."

Then what of poetry? Did Dante write anything better than "Inferno," and "Purgatory and Paradise?" Then we have Milton's "Paradise Lost;" Tennyson's "In Memoriam;" Bryant's "Thanatopsis;" Longfellow's "Village Blacksmith" and "Two Angels;" Whittier's "Driftwood Fire" and "Laus Deo;" and Lowell's "After the Burial" and "In the Twilight." These all were inspired by religion.

What of Christian archæology? In sacred architecture the æsthetic and religious join. Mural decoration, painting, reliefs, and mosaics are uniformly Christian. Old Testament scenes, prophets, apostles, and the Virgin meet us everywhere. Sacred Greek architecture reached perfection. They built twenty-eight matchless temples from 600 to 335 B. C., or two hundred and sixty-five years. Romans borrow from Greeks, as English, French, and Germans borrow from both. As ministers to æsthetic-religious taste these sacred edifices are fruitful. St. Peter's at Rome, and the Cathedrals at Milan, York, Westminster, and many others, are grand models of sacred art. There they stand, mute yet eloquent witnesses of the devotion of other years; prayers they are, frozen in stone. The soul's cry of a thousand years ago is heard in "long-drawn aisle and fretted vault."

What of revelation? Do we find the æsthetic in Scripture? It is not in the first chapter of Genesis, but it is in the second; for "out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight." In the third it is also, with the ugly; Eve saw that the forbidden tree was "pleasant to the eyes." Our modern critics agree with Moses that the science of the beautiful is objective as well as subjective. The poem of Lamech is the oldest. (See Gen. iv, 23.) The sense of beauty and the spirit of poetry thus antedate all art and philosophy. Noah's rainbow appealed to his sense of beauty and to his religious nature. In Gen. xlix Jacob blesses his sons in a Hebrew poem of seventy-six lines. The poetic spirit is on Moses and Miriam at the Red Sea; Balaam's four poems in Num. xxiii and xxiv are gems; the poetic fire in Hannah's heart breaks out at the offering of baby Samuel; and in Job we have moving mountains, sealed stars, Orion, the Pleiades, the spreading light, the pillars of heaven, the moon walking in brightness, and the golden splendor of the north. The Psalms are fruitful. In the first, by the waters we see a goodly tree with unwithering leaf; in the eighth, we survey the circling spheres; in the nineteenth, the heavens speak to us; in the twenty-third, we walk beside still waters in green pastures; in the forty-second, midst cooling shades we part the branches, to see the hart panting amidst the ripples of the waterbrook, while from out the thick-tangled wildwood the baying of the hounds and hunters' calls come faintly, and mingle with the surf of the great sea as it moans along the shore. In the forty-sixth, we are tranquil though mountains lose themselves in the deep, and though the waters roar in their troubling; in the sixty-fifth, we see soft showers, springing furrows, the year crowned with goodness, the hills girded with joy, pastures clothed with flocks, and valleys covered with corn; in the eighty-fourth, we are in God's house, and swallows and sparrows twitter in their nesting, and our valley of weeping is a place of springs; and in the one hundred and forty-ninth, everything takes to song and praise. In the Song of Songs the odors of the rose of Sharon and the beauty of the lily of the valley greet us. We partake of the honeycomb and fountains, and our thoughts are as sweet as "doves beside waterbrooks," and clean as "a flock of sheep newly shorn." The New Testament continues in like spirit. Mary, when informed of the future birth of Jesus, departed for the hills, that midst nature's rugged grandeur she might meditate. Meeting Elizabeth in the hill country, she raised her feelings in the beautiful poem recorded by Luke. Its companion is from the father of John Baptist on the birth of the forerunner.

The fisher son of Zebedee is the apostle of light. He ransacks the wide domain of nature for word-signs; celestial architecture, fountains, and music rise and gleam and float about us in bewildering plenitude as we sit, on Patmos, at his feet. Troops of pure beings swing to and fro clad in clean white linen; sweet presences carry about measuring-rods of gold; the Lamb leads the redeemed by living fountains; a bride makes ready for a banquet; precious stones flash from foundation, walls, and gates; the streets are of gold; the music is from angels, men, harps, trumpets, floods, and spheres. Royal are the splendors; seraphic the minstrelsy. Is it not a last appeal to the element of beauty in us?

Yet, sad to say, where the Church has lavished the treasures of art piety struggles for life. Greek art at its zenith looked down on morals most detestable, and though the Tiber were lined with gems from brush and chisel, faith gasps for breath, and hides in loneliness till summoned forth by the daybreak of the Reformation. Hunger and nakedness beg at the portals of St. Peter's and Westminster. Within are gold and gems, the gatherings of centuries; without are God's starving poor. Does æsthetic taste sometimes grieve away the religious spirit? Methodism does not beautify beyond the conditions of those at her altars. She cannot take five hundred precious years in which to build a cathedral; but she builds three chapels daily, and stands in neglected places to invite the lowly. She erects her costly city churches or contents herself with a chapel of plain boards or sod. Her schools will soon be of the best, and culture, music, painting, and all the sublime ministry of æsthetics will be the heritage of every child of the Church. The art of our ancestors glorified the masculine qualities of strength and courage. Christian art gives to mercy, tenderness, and love their apotheosis.

Art. IX.—ETERNAL VERITIES.

It may be questioned whether men think more deeply now than in former years, but it is undoubtedly true that they think more broadly. The stream of thought may not plow for itself so deep a channel, but it covers a vastly greater area. We have so many things to think of we are in great danger of superficiality. No man interested in the discovery and maintenance of truth can look with indifference upon certain tendencies of modern thought. The mistakes which men have made in reference to the physical forces, and to the origin of the material earth, and to the nature of the heavenly bodies, have very naturally raised the question whether they have not made a similar mistake in reference to religion. It is an age of general unrest. There is abroad a great disaffection with old ideas, old ways of doing things, and why not of old creeds? To make the matter worse, there is always present a class of men more brilliant than solid, who, finding the popular tendencies of the times, are willing to put themselves at the head of the column as leaders in what they arrogantly claim to be "Advanced Thought." These men dare to dig about the very corner stone of Christian truth. Nothing is too old or too sacred to escape their critical efforts. Theology is to be recast; creeds are to be sent to the moles and bats; we are to have a new way of thinking, a new way of preaching, and—this at least is a logical conclusion—a new way of living the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Thus men are troubled, especially those who read newspapers mainly to learn how and what people are thinking, and are ready to say, "Is there anything we can believe? Are there any eternal verities that a Christian man can stand upon and be sure he is right? Are there truths that were truths with the apostles and are truths now, and will be true when Christ shall come to judge 'the quick and dead?'" Surely it is a very discouraging view of religion to think that after so many years we have all been wrong. And then are not those who are advancing so rapidly merely inaugurating a course of thinking that will take men far beyond where they are willing to go? Will not future "advanced thinkers" look upon them as only the same distance ahead of their own times that they were behind those of their successors? If the Bible, honestly read, carefully studied, faithfully practiced, aided by the influence of the Holy Spirit, that ever-present help to enlighten the Christian, has not given us certain great cardinal truths that can stand the investigations and criticisms of all times, then we may safely conclude it is neither the "only" nor "the sufficient rule, both of faith and practice!" It will remain to be settled whether we shall put our consciences and judgments into the hands of the pope or turn our faces to the barren wastes of infidelity.

Practically the truth necessary to save lies near the surface of thought. The child's immature mind finds it very easily, and yet the profoundest thinker is compelled to admit that there is no lack of wisdom in the child's religion. The facts of science necessary to perpetuate life are easily found, and the highest attainments in knowledge do not set aside these earlier and simpler truths. Men raised wheat in Egypt when they knew nothing whatever of the sources of the Nile. They were utterly mistaken as to the cause of the swellings of their deified river, but they made the God-appointed use of its rich alluvium. They knew nothing of the reasons of seed growth and life development, and in this respect were not much behind our own age, but they did know how to raise the crop upon which their lives depended. Before men knew that the world moved once a year in a great circuit about the sun they knew "that seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter" were eternal verities in the economy of nature, and knew how to avail themselves of the fact. So our fathers may have known less of criticism than we; but they proved the Bible true, in a thousand instances, by trusting its promises and obeying its precepts, and found they were never mistaken. They fed upon the Bible as though it was manna from heaven, and found themselves growing stronger from the divine aliment. There were moral and intellectual giants in those days, and the world would be poor indeed if the results of their labor should be lost. They could give a reason for the hope that was in them with a skill that ought to put to blush many of the upstarts of to-day that suppose themselves greatly their superiors.

Christianity has a creed. There is something that all true Christians believe. Error may approximate the truth, it may get so much of it as to bring its votaries into harmony with Christian character. But there are certain truths essential for an aggressive, saving Christianity. Let us note some of these.

1. The Bible is the great creed of Protestantism. If the Bible is not from God we have no foundation for a single element of what we call Christianity. This is the great basal truth of all truths. Time may modify some views by which the Bible is held as authority, but never the fact that it is authority. We may in the future, as in the past, discuss the question of inspiration—its extent, its manifestation—but never to the destruction of the idea that the Bible is the word of the living God. Sound, honest, friendly criticism may modify our views in regard to certain books, chapters, and verses of the Bible, but the book that has thus far led man safely in this world—this only book that has thrown light upon his darkest moments of sin and misery—this book is not on trial to the Christian, it is simply his only hope, and, blessed be God, his sufficient hope! Nor will this book cease to be the foundation of creeds among Christians. Many foolish things are being said about creeds, as though they were human productions. To some extent they are, and to that extent subject to revision and improvement. Still, we cannot get along without them. We want to know what the Bible teaches, and when we have carefully considered its contents, and written down the conclusions to which they brought us, we have formed a creed. Theology is in the Bible as science is in nature; it is a work of love and duty alike to classify and arrange it. When so classified and arranged it becomes a creed. Men doing this have not always reached the same conclusions: they have not in nature. It is easy to see how these variations arise. A man may bring to the study a biased judgment. He may have some pet theory that causes him to unduly emphasize a truth, and thus put it out of proportion with other truths. This must of necessity mar the symmetry of truth if it do not seriously affect its use. Or, finally, men may be influenced in forming their opinions by the peculiar make-up of their own minds. Yet no man ever truly and honestly sought to know the truth of Scripture in order to live according thereto who did not find all of truth necessary to salvation. Now, every creed is what somebody believes the Scriptures teach. A man may persist in fighting creeds—all creeds but his own—but he has one that he is dogmatically asserting all the time. Every Church has a creed, whether written or not; it would be only decent if they wrote it down, so that all men might know what they agree upon in reference to the teachings of the Bible. Few men make their own creed. They are dominated by some master mind. This, again, is no objection to their creed; on the contrary, it is greatly in their favor. One would rather have the creed of a student of the Bible like John Wesley or Richard Watson than to accept the crude intellectual wanderings of some callow youth or morbid old man out of joint with his times and his Church. "The survival of the fittest" is the best test of differences in creeds. God will take care of his own truth. Only let all final appeals be made to the word of God.

2. The incarnation of Christ is truthfully established. In spite of all philosophies, in spite of all difficulties, "God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." The Infinite becomes knowable when brought within the compass of human observation and experience. One may not take it all in, any more than he can see across the ocean, but he may take in all that his relationships involve. A man apprehends God, if he does not comprehend him. Nay, he comprehends him in all respects where he needs God's help. The fact that he is more than one sees in Christ only fits him to be his God forever.

3. The atonement is being assailed most desperately by some. We are told by one class that justice needed no satisfaction. These say that God, having all power, could do as he pleased. If he pleased to save the sinner he had a perfect right to do it. The atonement had nothing to do with justice, but was an exhibition of God's love to men; it was to draw our love toward him. Man needed to be reconciled to God, not God to man. Still another class, professing to be Christian, deny all forgiveness of past sins. We are under the reign of law. All violations of law must be punished. The only use of the atonement was to get the life of Christ into the soul; the only significance of the blood is life; the only forgiveness is power to prevent our committing any more sins. How all these refinements of human philosophy are swept away by the startling fact that God says, "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth, it shall die!" How can a man work out the penalty of death but by dying eternally? So, again, life comes by the forgiveness of the penalty. It is useless to quote Scriptures in such a case. They are so many and so plain that if a man deny them or explain them away he will be able to do away with anything in the Bible that he finds in the way of his chosen theories. How grandly the doctrine of the atonement stands, not only as God's manifestation of love for his creature man, but as his highest, grandest protest against sin! In the light of the cross we see not only how ready he is to forgive if we repent and believe, but also how certain our doom if we believe not! God is a Father, but he is also a King. The proper adjustment of these relations is secured by the death of Christ. False and pernicious statements of this doctrine have been made, but the truth stands as the very corner stone of Christianity, as clear to the experience as it is plainly taught in the Bible and approved by a sound philosophy.

4. Justification. That men may be forgiven is as certain as that the Bible has a truth plainly stated. That they may know the fact is as old as the days of the Psalmist, who said, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." That it is not brought about by good works, or by any form or ceremony, is the constant teaching of the Bible. "The just shall live by faith." This keynote of the Reformation is the first step in the Christian life. It must be maintained in spite of the materialistic notion of the reign of law and consequent impossibility of forgiveness, to which some professed teachers of God's word are giving too great consideration. If God cannot forgive, then no such idea of a moral government can be entertained that can be of service to us in getting rid of the heaviest burden an awakened conscience can bear, the self-condemnation for offenses past. So thought not John when he wrote the truth that has carried many souls out of the shipwreck of sin into the land of light and promise, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

5. And here we must consider the very holy of holies of gospel truth. We may become the children of God. We may have the witness of the Spirit to that fact. Great and unspeakable as the privileges of this relation are—far-reaching as the consequences for good may be to the saved—the fact abides, the truth is plain, we are the sons of God by the adoption which is secured by faith. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." And this leads to another truth connected with it, that we are fitted for our inheritance "by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." Sanctification—a work done in the soul by the power of God—is not merely a fond thing of the Christian aspiration, but a God-given reality in the lives of those who reach up to their high calling in Christ Jesus. Now, these verities of the word are equally verities of human experience. They are found true by the highest test by which any truth may be established. They point also to other truths equally important, and certainly taught in the Bible.

(1.) The fact of sin in the work of salvation involves the doctrine of depravity. "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God." This certainly is our estate by nature. We do not inherit guilt, but we do inherit a "bent to sinning." Any true remedy must meet the characteristics of the disease. It was no common or insignificant moral evil that called for the interposition of the Son of God. This doctrine, too, has its practical importance. Unless men see the seriousness of their case they will not readily apply for cure. When men can be made to see that they are "dead" already, and also "lost," it will be the easier to stir them up to "lay hold upon the hope that is set before them."

(2.) As a necessary companion truth of this, we have another which the world needs as a basis of morals—an enlightened conscience in reference to divine things. Without the revelation of God there can be no authoritative ground for right and wrong. Morals will degenerate into convenient expedients for regulating society. It will soon be but little more than the laws of the State or municipality, and when Christian morals shall have no hand in framing these laws what will they become? But true Christian morals go much further. They involve a wise and proper adjustment of all possible relations of man to the divine purpose in the work of salvation. There are things that are lawful that are not expedient. Every generation opens its eyes to new facts and relations that need to be settled afresh. No precise law can do this. A saved humanity can. We may more safely trust the judgment of a man who walks with God than all the arguments of the best intellects the world can produce. Not in the glitter of intelligence will we find the safe way to live, but in the inner moral consciousness when we look there to see what the Spirit has written. The Bible was never intended to be a text-book for moral conduct; instead of that, God has made it a means of finding how to "feel the least approach of sin." Thus shall it be true forever that they who name the name of the Lord shall depart from iniquity. This shall ever make the true Christian the "salt of the earth," the "light of the world."

Now, these are some of the eternal verities that have come down to us from the apostles. They are the working truths of evangelical Christianity. They stand against infidelity on one side and against formalism and superstition on the other. As Churches depart from them to take the place of doubt or to take the place of a superstitious view of devotion, they lose their power and are left behind in the march of humanity. The law of the survival of the fittest has already settled the truth of these doctrines. Reformers reform not unless they follow this plan in its entirety. They may cry, "Lo, here, or lo, there!" but the kingdom of heaven is not built up by them.

That these doctrines, drawn out in all their fullness, involve points about which pure and mighty minds may differ goes for the saying. That a restatement of them is always in order is only to recognize in them the same elements inherent in all truths which are many-sided, and so great as to be well-nigh out of reach of the human reason. But restatements are one thing, rejecting them is quite another. However you look at them they are to be the things you see, not something else. If the men of one generation shall turn from these, the necessities of humanity will bring the next one back to them. If the Church should ever again find itself filled with the spirit of the world, with the doubt of the world, with the neglect of the Bible that characterizes the world, as the Church was one hundred and fifty years ago, another Wesley and another Whitefield would arise to shake the world by means of the simple truths that an overinflated humanity had supposed itself to have outlived.

EDITORIAL NOTES AND DISCUSSIONS.

OPINION.

THEOLOGY is an alluring study. A strict construction of the term would confine the investigator to an inquiry concerning the divine Being, his attributes and activities; in fact, to the relatively narrow field of human knowledge or speculation concerning the Almighty personality. But the word, like many others in the nomenclatures of men, has broadened to include far more than a consideration of the nature and the governing principles of the Godhead. Rather has the whole round of human inquiry into divine things now come to be legitimately included within the scope of systematic theology, of which we more particularly speak. Such are the always interesting problems of anthropology, soteriology, and eschatology. What sin may be in its essence and its effects; how extensive the divine authority over evil; what the nature of the hypostatic union, or the structural constitution of the human soul; what the measure of human responsibility, and what the realities of the future existence, are some of these problems which fill human thought and elicit the discussion of the scholars. It is true that the human quality involved in all theologic definition will inevitably impress itself upon the mind of the student in any thorough theologic investigation. The very term "theology," it will not be forgotten, had a heathen origin—those great thinkers, Plato and Paul, having understood by it "the doctrine of the Greek gods, and of their relation to the world." Only the Holy Scriptures are God-inspired; theology is but a gathering of human interpretations of that revelation. The Scriptures are the way of life, a lamp unto the feet and a light unto the paths of men; theology is but the guideboard that points to the wicket-gate and the road of salvation. And yet it must not be denied that a large sanctity attaches to the current theological definitions and formulas of the Christian Church. Because they have won the consensus of the ages they are not to be lightly esteemed or carelessly handled, as traders handle paltry wares. In short, the very indorsement given these definitions and formulas by the fathers—often after the stormy disputations of conventions and councils—indicates the unchanging interest in theological questions which lies back of all scholastic definitions. There is that in the scope of theology which is winsome to men. They ardently wish to know the facts regarding their own moral constitution; they are curious to reach the solution of the many problems involved in Christology; they long with an irrepressible desire to know the nature of that unseen life whither all earthly life is tending. Over inquiries such as these every successive generation in turn lingers, asking with the eager Pilate, "What is truth?" Theology is, in other words, one of the most engaging of all sciences. Without disparagement of other lines of scholarly pursuit in which men engage—but rather with a full recognition of the nobility of such departments of study as geology, which explores the earth's strata, or zoology, which classifies the animal creation, or astronomy, which sweeps the stars—we cannot relegate theology to the rear in comparison with these ennobling sciences. It leads the van; it is the chief because man has the religious instinct; and, because of this, all the coming generations of men will, in some sense, be theologians.

And now the name of Ernest Renan must be added to the list of the world's illustrious necrology. It was but lately that he indulged in pleasant self-congratulations that he had arrived at his seventieth year, and from the Scriptures, which he had so long challenged, quoted the sentiment that "the normal age of man" had been reached by him; but now, in obedience to the inexorable law of nature, he has passed on to join the company of the immortals, while his works do follow him. By what measurement shall Renan be estimated? For half a century he has been a recognized literary force in France, and much of the time has been accorded a chief place among her literati. His Future of Science, which was written in a few months at the early age of twenty-five, was an unusual book; his succeeding volumes, through a series of many years, have shown a man of great native force, of unwearied and wide investigation, and of ripened scholarship. So that were mere literary execution the criterion of judgment he would hold a permanent and enviable place in the list of the world's distinguished authors. It is not, however, as a merely literary character that Renan has long been known to the reading world. To at least the Christian portion of mankind he rather stands as a monumental instance of a severe though honest, and outspoken though not blatant, misinterpreter of the Holy Scriptures and the genius of Christianity. For two generations the student of ethics and comparative religion, as he has surveyed the field of scholarship, has discerned in the forefront of the philosophical critics of Christianity the prominent form of Renan. Whatever misconception of the true spirit and purposes of the man there may have been on the part of Christian believers—if such a misconception be possible—the Church has long since come to acquiesce in the verdict of Pius IX upon the French scholar, to the effect that he was the "European blasphemer." His rereading and misreading of the sacred Scripture, and his persistent misconception of the spirit of Christianity, is then the amazing feature in his life which elicits present notice. It is true that there have always been disbelievers in our holy faith. In the times of the incarnation, despite the fact that Christ by his miracles so clearly demonstrated his godhood, there were multitudes of Pharisees, chief priests, and scribes who received him not. He was persecuted by them as a deceiver, and was hung upon the cross as the arch impostor of his times. The spirit of Renan has not been dissimilar to that of those ancient critics of the Nazarene and his new doctrines. It does not seem to be the rule that men believe in proportion to the light which they receive. Though enjoying the full blaze of illumination which is the heritage of the student who closes the nineteenth century—and which in its irradiation shows a religious system undimmed by defect—there are those in the world who still discount, like Renan, both Christ and his Gospel. Apparently their mental operations are normal, and certainly they are vigorous. Yet in seeming honesty they discredit those cumulative evidences for the Gospel which have been sufficient to confirm its supernaturalism in the estimate of many of the world's profoundest thinkers; and upon the brow of the world's Redeemer they rather place in repudiation the crown of thorns. As a study in the peculiarities of human nature their cases are important. As to the measure of their impiety, they must be left to that final test of fire which "shall try every man's work of what sort it is."

Once more the Christmas bells ring in the steeples, with their call to reverent worship and their inspiration to gratitude for the goodness of God in the divine Epiphany. From the merely historic standpoint the birth of the Saviour is one of the most important events in the Scripture record. Because of Christ's claims to the Messiahship, even though he were the arrant impostor that his enemies have held; because of his potential relations to the civilization of the past eighteen centuries; and because of his molding influence upon the manifold life of the present generation, there is not an iota involved in the story of the incarnation which has not already been the object of minute scrutiny on the part of the world's great scholars, and which will not challenge the attention of chronologists and historiographers for the centuries to come. Even as the student would study the birth and the infancy of Zoroaster, of Confucius, of Mohammed, among the world's great religious leaders, in a dispassionate spirit and with a desire to learn the established data of their personal lives, so there is enough in the birth of Jesus to stir all the enthusiasm of the specialist in historic pursuits. The diverse genealogical tables of Matthew and Luke thus afford him an intricate problem to whose attempted solution he should not be averse. The place of the nativity—with the contending claims of Bethlehem and of Nazareth, as viewed from the standpoint of Christian faith or of critical doubt—the personality of Joseph and of Mary, the identity of the Magi, the nature of the "star" which overhung the manger, and the date of the Messianic birth are also additional questions to whose importance the element of the wonderful and even the miraculous lends a heightened charm. But while all these questions are transcendent in the estimate of scholars, and while their settlement is important to the maintenance of our Christian system, there is another and not less beneficial lesson for the "common people" in the recurring Christmas anniversary. Textual criticism or historic challenge in their experience must make way for happy sentiment. The essential brotherhood of humanity is the glorious truth which psalter and song and sermon revive in their consciousness each Christmas season. The Christ who lay as a babe in the manger of Bethlehem, though a Jew as to earthly parentage, was the Redeemer of all peoples, and with his advent joined the hands of the nations at the antipodes in indissoluble fraternity. The time is, then, emphatically one for peace. The unequaled beauty of the first Christmas song, which broke on the ears of the shepherds at Bethlehem, is paralleled by its practical setting forth of the fact of human brotherhood. Whatever be the proper exegesis of the ἐπί γῆς εἰρήνη of St. Luke, its value as a working sentiment is great. How inconsequential seem human differences as the anniversary of the Nativity approaches! How unfortunate the most just wars in which the nations of the world have ever engaged, even where fundamental human rights have been involved! How trivial and wicked the strifes waged in the interests of personal selfishness and racial ambition, that have stained the earth with the red blood of warriors! Aside from the chief lesson of the holiday season, as found in the fact of the incarnation for human sin, there is no truth more imperative of remembrance in this world of jars and discords. And we perhaps venture little in expressing the belief that the teeming multitudes of the globe to whom the gospel story annually comes are not unmindful of this underlying fact of human fraternity which is involved. The sentiment is very likely a growing one—perhaps with the Jew as well as with the Gentile, and with the skeptic as well as with the Christian. Behind the bestowment of gifts in many households, the reunion of kindred, and even the appointed services which mark denominational practice, there exists this deep and growing interest in one's fellow-men which Christianity always emphasizes. It has its expression in the interchange of cordial greetings and well-wishes, the bestowment of well-directed charities upon the poor, and the forgiveness of enemies. It is among the most noble of all sentiments, and in its growing observance will be brought about one of the great purposes which we may think was designed in the birth of the holy babe at Bethlehem.

Biblical criticism in the better sense of the term is a certain consequence of Bible study. The tendency of all true research is toward the fullest and freest investigation of the fundamentals which are involved in any line of inquiry pursued. True scholarship is an exhaustive knowledge of details. And as every modern science is forced to undergo the searching scrutiny of each successive student of its occult principles, it is not strange if the demand obtain that biblical truth should always lie open to investigation. The Scripture, with its lofty claim to inspiration, its asserted authority over human thought and conduct, its mysterious leadership among the volumes of the world, cannot be a closed book. It has always courted the fullest inquiry, and only by the opportunities it affords the student of the future for his deliberate investigation may it maintain its primacy among the text-books of religion. As the works of nature fashioned by the great Creator have undergone the test of microscope or telescope, so has revealed truth escaped no ordeal which men in their argus-eyed scrutiny have known how to apply. And there is something of daring, dash, and unconventionality in all human investigation. The words of Renan are almost of the nature of an aphorism: "Criticism knows no reverence; it judges God and men. For it there is neither prestige nor mystery; it breaks all charms; it tears aside all veils. This irreverent power, turning upon everything a firm and scrutinizing look, is by its very essence guilty of treason toward God and man." The inquiry of the present age into the meaning of the Scripture is not, then, a surprise. No generation has ever weighed it in finer-poised balances. Reckoning as of prime importance such questions as the authorship of the various books of the Bible, their dates, their authenticity, their accuracy of translation, or their textual meaning—present scholarship is prosecuting these inquiries to the uttermost limit. The Bible has been under tests in every century; it is passing through the trial of furnace fires heated to seven times their wonted heat, in the present epoch. Yet criticism, if it be not iconoclastic, is not to be shunned or feared. The purposes of truth are thereby more fully served. True biblical criticism is helpful alike to Christian faith and progress.

The practice of morality is no less important than the profession of religious experience. In other ages of the world the nicer regard for integrity and honor in daily deed has not always kept pace with claims to sanctity. With the strains of the Te Deum yet lingering on their lips men have turned away from the worship of Christian temples to sing the songs of bacchanalian revelry; and with hands still fresh from the touch of holy things they have gone forth to take part in injustice, extortion, and bloody warfare. But Christianity, in its constant advance through the world and its growing control over the daily lives of its disciples, is not remiss in its emphasis of the necessity of practical morality. Neither psalm-singing in mellifluous accent, nor almsgiving with Pharisaic open-handedness, nor prating professions of experience, is of itself enough. Practice must go hand in hand with profession. To perform is better than to preach. Quiet integrity in daily service is better than unctuous testimony. The way to heaven is through right living. There is perhaps no lesson which the world needs more imperatively to learn. In its daily living the experience of all the ages but repeats itself. Men know better than they do. Led away by the cares of business, the allurements of fashionable life, or the glitter of worldly amusements, they too often divorce their practice from their creed, to the loss of self-respect and reputation. Nor are they alone the injured in such courses of conduct. But the practice of the daily moralities also affects the well-being of society at large. That community is the most stable where men illustrate the practical virtues in their daily living. That State or nation is the most prosperous where these same virtues are given the preference to personal desires. For their temporal prosperity men should learn the lesson that right-thinking and right-doing bring a present profit which is hundredfold.

CURRENT DISCUSSIONS.

THE MODERN MISSIONARY IMPULSE.

THERE is not in all the ideals of philanthropy and benevolence a concept so sublimely grand, so morally beautiful, as the thought which is the soul of the missionary enterprise. That thought is the exorcism of the spirit of evil from every human soul and the enthronement of Christ in the affections of regenerated humanity as a coming fact in human history. It is a concept of the whole world freed, not merely from the dominion but also from the presence of sin; of a world rescued from heathenism, superstition, barbarism, skepticism, vice, crime, war, and every other hurtful thing; of a world washed in the blood of the Lamb, and having all its inhabitants adorned with the graces of the Holy Spirit, bound to each other by the silken bonds of brotherly love, and drawn, as by a mighty magnet, to Him who was "lifted up" that he might transform it into this condition of universal loveliness and happiness.

It was this concept of the world not merely redeemed, but really saved, through his redeeming blood, that filled the heart of the Saviour with holy joy when the seventy evangelists returned from their brief missionary journey rejoicing over their unexpected success, and especially over the fact that even devils had been subject to their power through his name. In that moment Jesus viewed their success as the first fruits of that preaching of the Gospel by which he willed to bring the world to his feet. His prophetic eye saw in it the ultimate triumph of his Gospel as an accomplished fact, and he exclaimed, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." The mighty evil force which had hitherto ruled, and for some ages was still to rule the world, became to his prophetic vision, while still existent, a power suddenly, visibly, and finally overturned; and mankind, freed from its cunning solicitations, stood before him gratefully singing the praises of his love. Thus beholding the certain issue of his redemptive work, his great soul was thrilled with a divine joy; he thanked his Father that those seventy disciples, who were but babes in the wisdom of men, had been permitted to symbolize the triumph of that kingdom which had been delivered to him with power to reveal it to whomsoever he might find willing to receive it. And then, as if desirous of impressing the certainty of that grand triumph of his Gospel upon their minds, he proceeded to assert that all the power necessary to the overthrow of the dominion of evil was in his hands, saying, "All things are delivered to me of my Father."

Hence the concept which lies at the root of the missionary impulse is not an ungrounded speculation, but an ideal sure to find its realization in the experience of mankind. This certainty is implicit in the great missionary command in which Jesus pledged his perpetual presence and aid until the day of its consummation. In the words cited above it is explicit, as indeed made as certain as the existence of Jesus himself. As sure as he is the Truth, the Life, and the crucified One, so sure is the coming of the glorious day in which this poor world, so long cursed by the spirit of evil, will be a saved world!

The merely intellectual perception of this grand root-thought may excite admiration, may charm one's æsthetic tastes, may even awaken faint desire to contribute some trivial service for its realization; but it never has and it never can give birth to the genuine missionary impulse. The object sought, being chiefly spiritual and aiming to reach the material well-being of mankind through a spiritual life, cannot be grasped until one's interests are centered in spiritual things. Christ's love for humanity was the impulse of his self-sacrifice for its redemption. And no man whose affections are not set on Christ, no man whose soul is not an abiding place for Christ, can be in active sympathy with his aim to regenerate humanity. How can one labor for human salvation who is indifferent to his own spiritual interests? Neither can one who is spiritually lukewarm be the possessor of that measure of missionary impulse which begets deep devotion to the great missionary movement of the age. But when Christ is so emphatically the life of a man that he can intelligently and sincerely say with Paul, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me," then Christ's aims become his aims; what Christ loves he also loves; and what Christ wishes done in the world he attempts to do so far as in him lies.

This relation of the missionary impulse to deep spirituality is demonstrated by the fact that it was not developed in the apostles until the hour of their Pentecostal baptism. That they had loved the Master prior to his crucifixion need not be questioned. But that first affection was superficial and alloyed with vanity, arising out of their friendly connection with the Teacher whose miracles made him the wonder of the times, the cynosure of all eyes. It was not rooted in a clear conception of his divine character and of the spirituality of the kingdom he was founding. Hence, although it was strong enough to move them to an avowal of their readiness to adhere to him in any possible peril, their love was only a flickering flame, which was so nearly extinguished by the fierce blast of the persecution preceding the tragedy of Calvary that "they all forsook him and fled." But after that baptism of fire which so illuminated their previously dull understandings as to give them a clear comprehension of the spiritual nature of their Lord's kingdom and a perception of the amazing love for humanity implied in his incarnation and death, their feeble affection blazed into a flame of holy and intelligent love kindred to his own; then they loved him most devotedly, and partook so fully of his love for humanity that they entered at once with heroic self-devotion upon the work of persuading men to become his disciples. Thus the missionary impulse was born under its inspiration; the men who had fled when their Master was arrested in the hour of his unparalleled agony were transformed into heroes defiant of persecution, indifferent to the toils of travel, the pangs of destitution and of death by violence and torture. Through them this divine impulse was imparted to others and transmitted to many generations until their Lord's message of salvation was communicated to all the then civilized world, and the paganism of the Roman empire lay prostrate at the feet of Christianity, like the image of the Philistine Dagon before the ark of the Lord.

But the success of this divine impulse, by bringing the Church it had built up into connection with the empire, was mightily checked. The smiles of the State, with the temptations of wealth and power which it spread before the leaders of the Church, chilled the love which inspires the missionary impulse. Selfism displaced love in multitudes who nevertheless continued to call themselves Christians. The "Dark Ages" succeeded. With the decline of the love of Christ the impulse to diffuse the pure Gospel was also more or less paralyzed. Yet it did not die. Even Rome herself, though fallen and generally corrupt, illustrated the depth of her hold on the thought and habit of the early Church in her zealous endeavors to persuade heathen nations to accept her creed and ritual. Long after she had lost her knowledge of Christ as the only Saviour of the soul she persisted with a zeal worthy of the true object of preaching in urging men to put their trust in her false interpretations of Christian truth and in her sacerdotal pretensions. But when Luther restated the scriptural doctrine of justification through that personal faith in Christ alone which begets conscious love for God, the true missionary impulse was revivified. Men who thus found Christ as their Saviour felt that strong impulse to proclaim him to others which, as we have seen, had its birth amid the rushing wind, the fiery tongues, and the polyglot voices of the day of Pentecost.

Professor Gotwald, writing of Luther in the Lutheran Quarterly, says that the missionary spirit "burned in his bones and lived as a quenchless life in his innermost soul." Consequently the Reformation, of which he was the author, "was all aglow with missionary ardor and missionary life." His missionary spirit was grounded on the idea that Christ, while requiring his disciples to begin their missionary work in the city of Jerusalem, bade them not to remain there or in Judea, but to carry his Gospel to heathen nations. "There is," wrote Luther, "no difference either as to places or persons. The Gospel is to be promulgated to the uttermost limit of the world."

Luther was no sentimentalist. To him ideas were stimulants to action, ingots of gold to be minted into evangelistic deeds. Hence, though the emergencies of the Reformation were so absorbing as to demand such exhaustive devotion to the rescue of Germany from the errors and corruptions of the papacy as to justify a temporary limitation of missionary labor to the home field, he was yet "very urgent in laying it upon the consciences of kings and rulers not only to protect and further true religion at home," but also to send "gospel messengers throughout the world." As one of the earliest results of this sound missionary teaching we may note the very interesting fact that in 1551, only six years after our great reformer's death, a Lutheran pastor named Truber translated the New Testament into the Wendish and Croatian languages, with a view to Christianizing the Slavonic populations of Europe and such of the Turks as spoke those dialects. Eight years later, in 1559, Gustavus Vasa, the Lutheran King of Sweden, sent missionaries to Lapland. In 1660 Duke Ernest of Saxe-Gotha sent missionaries to Russia, and shortly after to Abyssinia; and in 1705 Frederick IV of Denmark organized a foreign missionary society, which appointed missionaries to labor in India, where "thousands upon thousands of heathen souls were led to Christ" by them and their successors in that populous field. These, with other facts cited in the Lutheran Review from the "Handbook of Lutheranism," may justify us in regarding Martin Luther as being in no mean sense the instigator, if not the father, of modern missionary organizations. Most assuredly he himself was possessed by the true missionary impulse, which he very correctly taught to be inseparable from the love of Christ; and he communicated it to some of the best men of his age and country so effectually that one of them anticipated by his action those grand missionary organizations which are now energetically seeking to "preach the Gospel to every creature," both in Christian and in heathen lands.

The dependence of the missionary impulse on genuine and deep spirituality is demonstrated by the historical fact that nearly two centuries passed before the missionary spirit of Luther's Reformation became powerfully and generally operative in the Churches of Europe. This is accounted for, in part, by the fact that the false doctrines of Rome had taken such strong possession of the public mind that even to sincere seekers of Christian truth the cross was enveloped in mist. Hence, spiritual truths, being dimly comprehended, failed to work their legitimate and full effects in Christian experience. The religious life of Protestant Churches was, therefore, feeble and more or less inactive. In England the political plottings of the denationalized papal Church, the persecution of nonconforming Christians by high churchmen, and the vigorous warfare of deistical teachers on Christianity so distracted popular thought that spiritual darkness hung over the land and vice gained sufficient strength to keep its foot on the neck of virtue. Then truly spiritual men, being only a feeble minority, became disheartened. Their love of Christ, chilled by the deadly spirit of the times, was too powerless to prevent their missionary impulses from languishing into feebleness or falling into sleepy inactivity.

In this perilous extremity the grace of God quickened a few good men in Germany, historically known as Pietists, and begat in England that "second reformation" called Methodism. These divinely begotten forces made "the dry bones live and become a mighty army to conquer, not Germany and England only, but all the world, for the King of kings." "As a phase of this astonishing revival of godliness," says a recent writer, "a divine pity for man was kindled." It was a baptism of Christ-love; and it kindled a philanthropic desire to win men to Christ akin to that which stirred the souls of his followers in the first century and moved them to compass the world with his Gospel of good tidings on their lips.

To give effect to this sublime desire, which was the breath of Christ's love, Wesley, perceiving that it must needs have an organism for its visible habitation, culture, direction, and development, devised the simple ecclesiastical system known as Methodism. His classes, bands, societies, and Conferences were as unpretentious as were the informal assemblies of primitive Christianity. But they constituted an organism which was essentially missionary, eminently fitted to stimulate and guide spiritual minds to seek the highest possible development of the spiritual life and to do all their gifts and graces permitted toward the conversion of the world to Christ. As we know, it was amazingly successful. It quickly led many into the possession of experimental godliness. It inspired its first converts with intense and prayerful desire for the salvation of souls, and to personal efforts, both in private and in public meetings, to bring men to an immediate acceptance of the Saviour. This inspiration strengthened faith, and moved many of them to exclaim, after a day of much prayer, "We parted with a strong conviction that God is about to do great things among us." That this conviction was not a dream of the imagination is manifest to every man who to-day looks at the millions of souls who in all parts of the habitable globe are rejoicing in the life propagated and still being propagated through Methodistic instrumentality!

As in the birthday of Christianity and in the first years of the Lutheran Reformation, Methodism did its first missionary work, as Christ commanded, "beginning at Jerusalem." They recognized, as Luther had done, that in principle "there is no difference either as to persons or places," that Christian work in the home field is as truly missionary as in the foreign. The command to preach the Gospel "to every creature" makes it obligatory on the Church not merely to place the Gospel within reach of the public, if men choose to visit its preaching-places, but to devise means by which it shall be actually preached or taught in some way to every person, in every place. "To every creature" is Christ's emphatic phrase.

Is this obligation fully met by the modern Church? Is it not sadly true that it would be difficult to find a single city, town, or village in Europe or America which is so completely Christianized that one can say of it, "There is not a person in it who has not had the Gospel pressed upon his attention?" Is it not a fact that in well-nigh every place there are individuals and families which the Churches, by their inaction, tacitly admit to be beyond the reach of successful Christian effort? Practically no one cares for such souls, more or less of whom may be found in every community. Nevertheless, as hopeless as the case of these neglecters of the Gospel seems to be, many, perhaps most of them, might be won if personally and persistently sought out by suitable instrumentalities.

Is the truth of this last observation questioned? If so let the questioner turn his attention to the work of the Salvation Army. The methods of this singular body may be, actually are, offensive to one's tastes and judgment of the fitness of things. We are not prepared to defend them. They do not impress us as modes which the Christ would have approved; for he, though very condescending, was always quiet, dignified, and gentle. But despite the uncouth and distasteful methods of this "Army," one cannot reasonably deny that through the truths it has so distastefully taught it has won very many apparently hopeless cases from grossly sinful lives to faith in Christ and purity of conduct. Admitting this, may we not look upon the fruits with which God has crowned its work, not as evidence that he approves of its irreverent peculiarities, but that he has yet used it as his instrument to teach the Churches that the classes whom they have accounted beyond recovery are really within reach of Christian effort? May it not be his call bidding his people to make a complete conquest of the entire population in every town and city?

It would also seem that the attention recently given to the "slums" in large cities, to the deaconess movement, to preaching in public halls, and to similar modes of reaching those who will not go to the churches, should be viewed as from the Holy Spirit, seeking to direct the missionary impulse of the Churches to that feature of the great missionary command which requires them to preach the Gospel to "every creature" in Jerusalem (the home field) as well as to "every creature" in heathen nations. That will be a great day in the history of Christianity in which the majority of its Churches shall be consecrated to an unfaltering purpose to pray and work for the conversion of every soul in the city, town, or village where it is situated, taking as its motto and solemn pledge such words as these: "Every soul in this town belongs to Christ; we will give ourselves no rest until every such soul has been personally invited to become a disciple of Christ."

Working thus "at Jerusalem," the modern missionary impulse will continue to grasp at the regeneration of the nations which know not God as for a precious prize. This our Methodism did as early as 1784, when it organized its first Methodist missionary society "for the establishment of missions among the heathen." It has been and still is claimed by some that the devoted Carey was the founder of modern missions. But "The Particular Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel Among the Heathen," under whose auspices Carey went to India, was not organized until 1792. It is true that Carey went to India several years before Methodist missionaries began their work in Africa and India, because the openings for missionary laborers were so inviting and so urgent in the British Channel Isles, in the West Indies, in Newfoundland, and in North America, that, until 1811, it was thought advisable to postpone for a season the purpose of the society to establish missions among the heathen. In that year it sent missionaries to Africa, and in 1814 to India. Thus Methodism, while "beginning at Jerusalem" and laying secure foundations there, was also obedient to that feature of the missionary command which requires the Gospel to be preached "to every creature" in the inhabited earth. And its Missionary Society was in the van of such modern organizations.

The thorough conversion of Christian countries is fast becoming a vital condition of the success of the Gospel in heathen nations. Modern commerce, modern diplomacy, and modern means of travel are bringing the peoples of all lands into such intercommunication and such political relations that their characters become known to each other. As never before Christian nations are now sufficiently unveiled to the observation of intelligent citizens of China, India, and Persia as to be objects of tolerably fair moral judgment. If, for example, England violates the law of justice and benevolence in compelling China to open her ports to vessels laden with opium, China recognizes and resents her injustice and inhumanity; if America, unwilling, and perhaps justly so, to permit China to swell our population by sending millions of heathen subjects as emigrants to our shores, rejects those emigrants with brutal violence and in defiance of acknowledged treaties, China perceives and reasons that she is not honorably treated—that America, being a Christian nation, ought not to restrain the objectionable immigration by harsh enactments, but by new treaty arrangements, especially as China is as desirous of keeping her subjects at home as America is to prevent their coming. As things now are, when Christian Churches send missionaries with the Holy Bible to India and China the unchristian conduct of England, in the one case, or of America, in the other, stands out as a formidable barrier to their success. The thought, if not the language, of either people to the missionary must be, "If the religion you offer us has not power to prevent the people you represent from doing us such great wrongs why should we accept it?" On the other hand, if England and America were in all respects "living epistles," exhibiting the spirit and especially the ethics of the Gospel in their diplomatic dealings, their moral purity and manifest righteousness would commend the Gospel which they profess and give the missionary an irrefutable argument in its favor.

It follows, from this view of the bearing of national character on missionary success in foreign lands, that while the Churches are pressing the battle against heathenism with unresting vigor they should also solemnly resolve to thoroughly Christianize their home communities. By seeking a deeper spirituality as the inspiration to this home missionary work, by making the ethics of the Gospel dominant in industrial, financial, commercial, and political circles, and by bringing every soul of age to understand the truth, face to face with Christ's incomparable saying, "Come unto me, . . . and I will give you rest," they would, by God's promised blessing on such endeavor, make this great nation a "living epistle," known, understood, respected, and revered throughout the world—a factor in the foreign missionary work that would contribute mightily to the triumph of the kingdom of Christ over the kingdom of Satan.

The Christian student, surveying the signs of the times, can scarcely fail to be convinced that God is working mightily to bring about the speedy triumph of the kingdom of his Son. Not only as noted above is he calling his Church to greater endeavors in the home field, but also to more energetic action in the heathen world. On every side he sees evidences of the unprecedented intensity of the missionary impulse. In our own Church the princely contributions of the last year to her various societies for Christian work, which, if the sums raised for mission work in our cities be included, must have amounted to little short of two millions of dollars, indicate the disposition of her members to furnish abundant means for the support of mission work at home and abroad. Looking, then, at the increasing need of laborers in missionary fields, he beholds the "student volunteer movement" which numbers thousands of more or less educated young men pledged to do missionary work in foreign lands; looking further, he notes the desire of many laymen to go abroad at their own expense as lay workers, gaining their subsistence by mechanical labor, and spending their spare time in evangelistic work; next, appears the plan of self-supporting missions, such as Bishop Taylor is testing in Africa with considerable success. These, with the plan for the employment of individual missionaries to be sent out and supported by local churches, independently of direction by missionary organizations, and various other measures, are advocated by ardent minds. To the thoughtful observer most of these proposed methods, though indicative of the intensification of the missionary impulse, are yet so lacking in prudent adaptation to the actual condition of things in foreign lands as not to promise desirable results. Most of them assume that the average Christian student is or can readily and easily be qualified to go into a foreign land, acquire a difficult language, endure the physical effects of a sickly climate, and possess the self-poise, the self-adaptation, the force of character, and the practical wisdom indispensable to a successful missionary. The concept of independent missionaries thrust into the field by single churches and unguided by the experience and knowledge acquired through correspondence with men placed in the field by missionary organizations is absurd and misleading. A man of exceptional ability and force of character, finding himself in a strange land among people of a strange language and of semibarbarous habits, might possibly hew his way to success. But the average man would speedily lose heart, sink into despondency, return home if he could find means to do so, and after a vain struggle give up all hope and die. No; the heathen world is not to be saved by such instruments, who in most cases mistake the impulse to win the souls nearest them for a call to foreign mission work, which is a special influence from the Holy Spirit. Nevertheless, as evidences that Christ is working in men's minds in the direction of the world's conversion the Christian student rejoices over these workers, believing that He who begat these impulses will bring them into harmony with missionary methods tested by experience, and lead those moved by them into association with the great organizations which God has sealed with his approval by giving them much rich fruit.

But the best sign of the times is the astonishing prosperity of missionary work in Africa, in China, and especially in India, where the power of the Holy Ghost to save souls, though unaccompanied by visible tongues of fire, is as manifest as it was in the great day of Pentecost. In presence of all the gracious signs one is moved to look with confidence for the coming of the day in which "the great voices in heaven" shall say, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." Amen and amen!

THE VALUE OF DOCTRINAL STANDARDS.

DOCTRINE in its usual significance is the formulation of human conceptions of divine truth. We must, however, clearly understand the meaning of this statement and the processes by which doctrinal definition is reached. The word "doctrine" does not mean, for instance, the opinion of an individual alone, who may be liable to error through limitations in his intellectual processes or through bias toward some particular view of biblical truth; but is rather the agreement of the many, whose natural endowments and tendencies of belief essentially harmonize. It is not the utterance of uneducated men, led into fallacious reasoning through very ignorance; but is rather the judgment of scholars who have enjoyed the instruction of the schools and possess technical knowledge of that concerning which they speak. It is not the passing definition of the hour which is liable to reconsideration and change; but is rather that consensus of the ages which gathers force from its very antiquity. Nor in its source is doctrine based upon the traditions of the Church, as Romanism has boldly taught, nor is it necessarily conformable to human reason, as rationalistic writers on dogmatic theology have sometimes held; but on the Bible alone, "as the source from which we have to derive our religious beliefs," is it constructed. With these distinctions in mind we may remark with profit on the necessity of doctrinal standards through the former periods of the Church and their particular value in the denominational experiences of the present age.

I. The very history of doctrinal formulation shows the worth of rigid theological definition, in the estimate of the earlier Church. To those on whom rested the responsibility of laying the foundations of the Christian structure, heresy in belief was among the most damnable of errors. Few chapters in the story of organic establishment are more interesting than those which cover the development of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity. To trace the growth of the idea of the Trinity, or the vicarious atonement, or the relation of faith to works, or the resurrection of the dead, or the general judgment, is a pursuit whose reward is ample. Slowly, as all great conceptions of scientific truth have been reached by scholars, involving sometimes reconsideration, as has been found necessary in the formulation of the best human definitions, and yet steadily, as men walk toward a goal, have these great ideas in theology come to their final formulation.

Around some of the great Councils of the Church which met in the earlier centuries for the framing of Christian belief what a glamour gathers for the ecclesiastical student, and, from the time-lasting results which were reached, how colossal every personality who sat in those supreme gatherings of Christendom! At Nice, at Constantinople, and at Ephesus these dramatic gatherings met to interpret that word whose right understanding makes men "wise unto salvation," every one of these Councils being a center of light in the often somber history of early Christianity. The words of Waddington, the church historian, concerning the Nicene

Council and its conclusions as to the relation of the Son to the Father, are pertinent to the line of thought in the present discussion and are deserving of partial quotation:

> Among so many assembled many there must have been of sincere intention and earnest piety, and certainly several well instructed in the learning of that age: and the excellence of these persons doubtless so influenced the general character of the Council that, though unable to repress the intemperate violence of some of its members, they were sufficient to conduct it to that decision which has now been followed by the great majority of Christians for fifteen centuries.
> The bishops began by much personal dissension and presented to the emperor a variety of written accusations against each other; the emperor burned all their libels and exhorted them to peace and unity. They then proceeded to examine the momentous question proposed to them. It was soon discovered that the differences which it was intended to reconcile might in their principle be reduced to one point, and that point might be expressed by one word; and thus the question appears to have been speedily simplified (as indeed was necessary, that so many persons might come to one conclusion on so mysterious a subject) and reduced to this, whether the Son was, or was not, consubstantial with the Father. Many of the leading bishops hesitated, or even held, in the first instance, the negative opinion, and among them were Eusebius of Cæsarea, the historian of Constantine, and Eusebius of Nicomedia, from whose hands the emperor afterwards received baptism. The former proposed to the assembly a creed, in which the word "consubstantial" (Homoousion) was omitted; but in which he anathematized every impious heresy without particularizing any. His advice was not followed. Then arose subtile disputations respecting the meaning of the word, "about which some conflicted with each other, dwelling on the term and minutely dissecting it. It was like a battle fought in the dark; for neither party seemed at all to understand on what ground they vilified each other." However, the result was perfectly conclusive; they finally decided against the Arian opinions, and established, respecting the two first persons of the Trinity, the doctrine which the Church still professes in the Nicene Creed.

This was the great Nicene Council. Nor of the importance of other famous gatherings succeeding this can there be difference of judgment. Such was the first Council at Constantinople, called by the Emperor Theodosius the Great, in A. D. 381, to decide upon the doctrine of the Holy Ghost; the first Council of Ephesus, convened by Theodosius the Younger, in A. D. 431, which declared against the Nestorian heresy concerning the double personality of Christ; or the Council of Chalcedon, under the Emperor Marcian, in A. D. 451, which "asserted the doctrine of the union of the divine with the human nature in Christ, and condemned the heresies of Eutyches and the Monophysites." All these gatherings had their place and function. Toward such great Councils, besides others that are spread along through the succeeding centuries as links in the great chain of ecclesiastical history, the reader will ever turn to learn the emphatic belief of the earlier Church in the necessity of doctrinal formulation. Upon every jot and tittle of theological definition these doughty defenders of the faith laid a supreme emphasis. And this emphasis they laid, not because they delighted altogether in hair-splitting definition and subtle jugglery with metaphysical or theological terms, like gladiators who loved the arena, but because they felt that accurate definition, according to the full measure of their understanding of the Scriptures, was necessary to personal stability in religious things. Of the importance of these early Councils an eminent authority in ecclesiastical history has testified as follows:

> The value of the decisions of the councils depends, not upon their authority as drawn together at the call of emperor or pope, not upon the number of the bishops who attended them, but upon the truth of their decisions and their conformity to the word of God. The Councils of Nice and Chalcedon rendered great service to the Church and to theology; but their Christological statements of doctrine have been received by the general Church down to the latest times, not because they emanated from the Councils, but because they satisfy the intellectual and moral needs of the Church and are held to be true statements, though in more scientific form, of doctrines explicitly or implicitly contained in the word of God.

The Council was thus indispensable for the Church of the earlier centuries. Thereby was the weed of heresy rooted up from the fair garden of the Lord, and thereby was faith made strong and interest quickened in the things which are supersensible.

II. But doctrinal belief is necessary as well to present denominational vigor. With any feeling of indifference as to the theoretical value of creeds we can have no sympathy; and toward any disposition to doctrinal relaxation which may obtain in these later times we can express no sentiment save that of stinging rebuke. The strong denominations of the world in the present age of Christianity are those which have come to their prestige through the announcement and persistent emphasis of some doctrine or group of doctrinal beliefs. It is impossible to write an intelligent history of early New England and omit from the records the story of the great Calvinistic controversy covering a century and a half of colonial and State history. The substitution of the "Savoy Confession" for the earlier Reformed standard which had been adopted took place in 1680, this change having been made by "the elders and messengers of the Churches in the colony of the Massachusetts in New England," while in the year 1707 the Churches of Connecticut made a similar substitution. Thenceforward the Congregational Church was the valiant exponent of the Calvinistic system in its various phases. Under the preaching of Edwards, Bellamy, and Hopkins, that "great triumvirate of New England theologians," as well as other less conspicuous but not less sturdy theologians of the Massachusetts and Connecticut pulpits, men's ears burned and their consciences were appalled by the story of the divine decrees. Where in the history of Christian preaching, since the apostles went forth to proclaim the truth to men, have communities been wrought to a more fervent heat over the meaning of the divine revelation than when Northampton, and Litchfield, and New Haven, and Boston, and other towns resounded with the clarion voices of these great giants in theological controversy? And to what does Congregationalism owe its survival and its present vantage-ground if not to its proud maintenance of the theory which it championed in the long past?

The Baptist Church affords a similar instance of vigorous, unrelenting insistence upon certain tenets as necessary to church membership and perhaps to salvation. Besides its emphasis of the distinctive doctrines of Calvinism, the necessity of immersion as the sole authorized method of Christian baptism, and the accordance of the privilege of participation in the service of the Eucharist only to those who have thus been buried in the waters of immersion, are the distinctive marks of the orthodox Baptist Church which distinguish it from all other branches of the Christian body. The disposition is sometimes shown to ridicule these pretensions of the Baptist body and to charge an intense bigotry upon the denomination. Yet without giving assent to that peculiar exegesis of the Greek text which leads the Baptist Church to discover immersion in the New Testament record, and exercising the right to construe the manuscripts of the New Testament according to other canons of interpretation, we must believe that this very tenacity of the Baptist Church to its convictions affords a partial explanation of its denominational vigor.

The case is not different with Swedenborgianism. Basing their reasons for denominational separateness upon the rhapsodies of the illustrious leader who gives them name, the Swedenborgians find in his written narration of heavenly experiences another law and gospel. Misguided as these followers of Emmanuel Swedenborg surely are, by all the standards of judgment which other denominations entertain, one must nevertheless admire their patient endurance of criticism, their tenacious adherence to sectarian peculiarities, and their philanthropic desire to bring the world to their position of belief.

In the case of the Unitarian Church is a parallel instance of doctrinal peculiarities tenaciously held. Failing to find in the New Testament Scriptures, by some strange process of ratiocination, the divinity of Jesus Christ—which the great denominations of the world, whether Romish, Greek, or Protestant, unite in discovering—the Unitarians virtually claim no more than the humanity of the Carpenter of Nazareth and emphasize the moral theory of the atonement. Blind leaders of the blind they surely are, unless the judgment of the whole Christian world besides is mistaken. And yet one cannot but feel a species of admiration for this sect upon whose eyes the scales yet remain, for their adherence to the doctrine which is at once their distinctive mark and their rebuke.

We cannot believe, with all these instances in mind, that the day for doctrinal emphasis has gone by. If the fathers preached the more important phases of Christian doctrine with a vigor that has now become traditional, it is possible that the pulpit instructors of the present day are too often silent upon the fundamental principles of Christian belief. Denominationalism in the past has been maintained by insistence on the standards of doctrine. Denominationalism in the present cannot afford to grow lax in doctrinal definition. Denominationalism in the future must build upon these same standards as upon a granite foundation-stone. A Church without its distinctive creed, however many its other excellences, is but a stately structure built upon the sand.

III. It therefore follows as a corollary that the many provisions for the maintenance of orthodox belief which are found in the practice of different ecclesiastical organizations are justifiable. In the enforcement of its doctrinal views each Church has the inherent right to resort to such measures, even though they be extreme, as will perpetuate its standards of belief. Every human organization, even of a political or social nature, possesses this inherent right and is often not averse to its exercise; and a process of self-purgation is necessary to the perpetuation of every organization since the world began that has been of human origin, has been directed by human codes of law, and has been officered by human leaders. It is not uninteresting, in this connection, to read the record of the punishment of heresy in the early Church, as given by the important ecclesiastical authority before quoted:

Soon after the triumph of Christianity over paganism, and its establishment by the State, the laws became very severe against heretics. Those of the State, made by the Christian emperors from the time of Constantine, are comprised under one title, De Hæreticis, in the Theodosian code. The principal are the note of infamy affixed to all heretics in common; commerce forbidden to be held with them; privation of all offices of dignity and profit; disqualification to dispose of their property by will, or to receive property; pecuniary mulcts; proscription and banishment; corporal punishment, such as scourging. Heretics were forbidden to hold public disputations; to propagate their opinions; their children could not inherit patrimony, unless they returned to the Church, etc. The laws of the Church consisted in pronouncing formal anathema, or excommunication, against them; forbidding them to enter the church, so much as to hear sermons or the reading of the Scriptures (this was but partially observed); the prohibition of all persons, under pain of excommunication, to join with them in any religious exercises; the enjoining that none should eat or converse familiarly with them or contract affinity with them; their names were to be struck out of the diptychs; and their testimony was not to be received in any ecclesiastical cause.

The severity of these early forms of punishment for heretical belief was undoubtedly necessary for the continuance of the nascent Christianity. Otherwise the disposition to every vagary of doctrinal belief would have run riot; and otherwise error would have supplanted truth with its luxuriant growth. The conception of heresy and its relation to Church and State, in the Middle Ages, is another important chapter in the history of ecclesiastical doctrine to which we cannot be oblivious. Included in this pregnant chapter will be found such matters as the relation of the scholastics to heresy, the papal bulls thereupon, or the pronouncement of Thomas Aquinas that when the Church had despaired of bringing back its heretics it should "cut them off by excommunication and then deliver them up to secular justice, which frees the world of them by condemnation to death." Of the reaction of the Reformation, following these extreme views of the Roman Catholic Church, notice must also be taken. We quote again thereupon:

The Reformation protested against these doctrines. Luther, from the first, denounced all attempts to overcome heresy by sword and fire instead of the word of God, and held that the civil power should leave heretics to be dealt with by the Church. On this ground he opposed Carlstadt. Yet it was a fundamental principle with all the reformers that governments are bound to prevent blasphemy. They saw that the people receive from the Church built on the word of God the pure preaching of that word, and to prevent all attempts at creating sects. This led to the adoption of preventive measures in the place of the former penalties of confiscation, bodily punishment, and death. These preventive measures confined the heresy to the individual, and extended as far as banishment, when no other means would avail. Luther admitted the use of secular punishment against heretics only in exceptional cases, and then not on account of the heresy, but of the resulting disorders. Even then he considered banishment sufficient, except when incitations to revolution, etc., required more severe punishment, as was the case with the Anabaptists; yet he often declared against the application of capital punishment to such heretics. Zwingle took nearly the same stand as Luther on this point, yet was somewhat more inclined to the use of forcible means. The Anabaptists were treated in a summary manner in Switzerland. Calvin went further, and with his theocratic ideas considered the State as bound to treat heresy as blasphemy and to punish it in the severest manner. His approbation and even instigation of the execution of Servetus gave rise to a controversy on the question whether heresy might be punished with the sword.

We have prolonged these historical references, though at the risk of prolixity, to make emphatic the proposition we wish to assert concerning the treatment of heretical belief in the present Church. Not only the prosperity but even the perpetuity of a denomination, it would seem, depends on the excision of heresy and the maintenance of those doctrinal standards which have been transmitted from the fathers. Creed and denominational coherence keep one another company, purity of belief and the enlarging prosperity of the Church of Christ. Viewed in the light of this position, the present theological trials for alleged heresy that are attracting the attention of the general American Church are both justifiable and necessary. Whether the case be that of a minister in the active pastorate or of a professor from some school of theology, the case cannot be radically different. An outspoken and continued assault upon any of the cardinal doctrines of the faith—as the denial of the Trinity, the challenge of the full inspiration of the Scripture, or the claim of a future probation for men—must not pass unnoticed. The prosperity of the individual is less important than the integrity of the denomination. The successive steps of advice, rebuke, ecclesiastical trial, and excommunication for a proven offense are justifiable alike on grounds of right and expediency. Only less important than experience in divine things is the doctrinal formulation of the truths which God has taught in his inspired word. To know the latter is to put one's self into intelligent position for the enjoyment of the former. Doctrine is a help to experience, and experience the path that leads upward to the skies.

TIMES OF REFRESHING.

THE revival is one of the phenomena of human experience. As a rule it comes unexpectedly. The ungodly do not anticipate its glowing fervor, and praying saints often grow weary while waiting for its appearance. Its motive power is mysterious. Unseen forces, more strange than the wind whereof Christ spoke to Nicodemus, actuate its participators, direct the exhortations and testimonies of believers, and rouse the emotions of the impenitent. Its emphasis is upon the enormity of sin. Although the moral law remains the same in its rigid commandments to do or to abstain from doing, yet transgression in such a time of quickening assumes a new heinousness in the estimate of men. The guilt which they before measured by the varying and even fallacious standards of the times they now view as in the blaze of eternal light. The disobedience to divine commandment, which before seemed to them but a peccadillo, now assumes those towering proportions which lead the guilty to exclaim, "My sins as mountains are." The revival also reveals invisible things. Men for a little forget their sordidness. Their eyes are opened to see the heavenly realities. The Father is no longer a far-away abstraction, but a living and loving personality; the Son comes to seem as an "Elder Brother," but just removed from human sight; the Holy Ghost is no more an indefinite and intangible influence, but becomes a near and precious Comforter. The innumerable company of angels seem near at hand, and all the hosts of the departed. The world of sense recedes; the supersensible fills the enraptured sight and charms the ravished ear. And the revival is far-reaching in its consequences. Like fields of harvest grain swept by the summer winds, the community bows its head before this resistless influence which "bloweth where it listeth." Stony hearts are broken. The raging lion becomes the harmless lamb. The leopard changes his spots. And as the consequence of the special outpouring of the Spirit the community takes on a new ambition, usefulness, and happiness. Measured by its visible results in every land where it pleases God that the fires of Pentecost should fall, the revival is the greatest phenomena in all human experience.

We risk nothing in saying that the revival is a divinely designated method for the renewal of the Church. The Scriptures seem crowded with this suggestion. Without lingering upon particular instances of etymology or discussing the merits of verbal significations, it is enough to say that alike in the Old Testament and in the New the indications show that God has appointed the revival as a valuable means for the increase of his Church. It would be a startling reflection, were the event not so familiar in New Testament history, to recall the fact that the Christian organization, whose influence now pervades all lands of the globe, had its corporate beginning in a scene of unparalleled revival interest. Toward that spectacular event in the city of Jerusalem, on the morning of the great festival of the Pentecost, the reader ever turns with reverent curiosity. It was the day that the prophet Joel had found room in his ancient prophecy to predict, and to predict in words of sublimity which must have stirred the devout Jews who waited for its blessed fulfillment. What majesty in that foretelling of the coming day of the Lord, as recalled in the Acts: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy: and I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke: the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come: and it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." So amid the ecstatic words of human instruments on whom the Spirit had fallen, amid the tears and beseechings of men whose hearts were bowed with the agony of sin, amid the preaching of the efficacious name of Christ as the Redeemer from guilt, and amid the rejoicings of the newly converted a new Church sprang into existence and influence.

But, following that august scene at Jerusalem, Pentecost has succeeded Pentecost in the experience of the Christian Church. The orderly and stated worship of the denominations is well. Neither anthems and chants, nor litanies, nor didactic preaching, nor catechetical instruction, should be altogether supplanted by the extraordinary methods which belong particularly to the revival season. Yet the disposition to formality, ritualism, worldliness, and spiritual declension is a tendency which has always been prevalent in Christian experience, and whose counteraction is in the seasons of refreshing which come intermittently to the Church. As illustrative of this general tendency toward spiritual decline one writer well describes the spiritual condition of New England at the beginning of the great revival under Whitefield, Edwards, and others: "Revivals had become less frequent and powerful. There were many in the churches, and some even in the ministry, who were yet lingering among the supposed preliminaries to conversion. The difference between the Church and the world was vanishing away. Church discipline was neglected, and the growing laxness of morals was invading the churches. And yet never, perhaps, had the expectation of reaching heaven at last been more general or more confident. The young were abandoning themselves to frivolity and to amusements of dangerous tendency, and party spirit was producing its natural fruit of evil among the old." For conditions so extraordinary as these—and they are more than paralleled by the neglect of religion and open wickedness preceding the Lutheran and the Wesleyan awakenings—the extraordinary solution provided seems to be the revival. There is startling force in the remark of such a veteran in evangelistic labor as Mr. Finney, that "almost all the religion in the world has been produced by revivals." We must believe, as we believe in the divine origin and the divine oversight of the Church, that the revival is divine method for the increase of Zion.

The human element involved in revivalistic work also invites our present attention. In its origin every genuine work of grace is divine; as to its conduct, it is under the direction of mortal agency. Two factors entered into the success of that first revival which set the pattern for the whole Christian Church. The first was the Holy Spirit, who fell that day on the hearts of men "like rain upon the mown grass;" the second was a group of one hundred and twenty Jews but lately turned from the faith of Israel, of whom the hitherto vacillating Peter was the spokesman and head. In the study of this first advance movement of the Church the fact appears which is evident in every subsequent outpouring of the Spirit—the apparent inadequacy of the visible means employed to accomplish the results desired. In the use of such unworthy means by the great Head of the Church is found a ceaseless wonder for reflecting men. Preferring the use of the one agency that was the instrument in the introduction of sin into the world, the Divine proposes by human means to overthrow the citadels of evil and effect the triumph of righteousness. With a heart that has felt the touch of evil, and a life that has been marred by its fell presence, regenerate man must engage in this great work. With limitations in wisdom that are depressing, lacking in tact as he approaches the fortress of the human soul, injudicious in the use of means, and impotent at the best, must he work out as a colaborer with God those sublime results which even an angel might hesitate to undertake.

With this consideration in mind, that redeemed and regenerated man is God's visible agent in the conduct of revivalistic work, the necessity of consistent Christian living is apparent. They should be "clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." Unless in exceptional instances God does not honor an indifferent, worldly, careless, prayerless Church with the special baptism of his grace. His Pentecostal gifts, as at Jerusalem, follow scenes of wrestling prayer like that where the one hundred and twenty met for ten days "with one accord." Men may raise their costly sanctuaries, embellish them with all the adornments of ecclesiastical art, and maintain a worship that is faultless in its antiphony, intonation, and ritualistic response. But into many a humbler scene, where plain men pray their unlettered prayers and offer their broken praise—an uncouth worship which æstheticism would despise—the Holy Ghost ofttimes more quickly comes with his quickening impulses. Right-heartedness determines the sending of God's greatest gift. Whatever the exceptions to the rule, the general fact regarding the revival movements of the Church is that an outpouring of the Spirit comes upon a church and a community where at least a few prayerful, consistent, and vigilant souls are watching for the refreshing showers from on high. "The real human sources of many revivals are more secret and remote. They have often been traced to some poor sick disciple, praying at home for years, or to a little band of believers meeting according to mutual pledges, and at times and places unknown or unconsidered by the mass of formal professors. The great harvesting of souls which in 1859 began in Ireland and advanced thence to Scotland and England had its obscure source in a meeting of four young men for prayer in an old country schoolhouse." Of the human causes for the effect of the celebrated sermon by President Edwards on "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," at the time of the "great awakening" in New England, a similar estimate is made: "It was believed that the sermon owed much of its success to the earnest petitions of a few believing persons who spent the whole of the previous night in a prayer meeting in the vicinity (Enfield). These prayers were made the more earnest by the fear that God, who was blessing other places, would in just indignation pass them by." All Christian history is permeated with this important truth. Revivals of the work of God turn not alone on the divine pleasure in the awakening and the conversion of sinners, but also on the desire of his human instruments in these regards. A faithful Church may open the windows of heaven by its persistent prayers. A faithless Church may defeat the divine purposes. And in all the consideration of the great question of revivals there is no lesson more pertinent as the harvest season of immortal souls once more arrives for the American Church.

It would also seem that the times are ripe for a world-wide revival of religion. In the foreign fields of the earth, dissatisfaction with the inferior religious systems of men—as in India, where the impotence of the Brahmanic and Buddhistic faiths are coming to be keenly felt—makes the opportunity favorable to Christianity. Men, in their sense of sin, their heart-hunger for the bread that satisfies, their longing for an eternal arm on which to lean, are willing to try the experiment of Western Christianity. Commerce, in its multifarious plans for financial profit, has also made possible the entrance of the Christian faith into the hitherto inaccessible regions of the globe. Embarked on the ships of trade, as Paul sailed on a grain ship of Alexandria, the Christian missionary may now enter the chief ports of the known world. China, with her unsatisfying idolatry, has a welcome for him. Japan waits to receive the benefits of his medical skill and to hear his evangelistic words. Corea bids him come in with the story of the Man of Nazareth. Commerce, with its personal plans for the wide interchange of commodities and the enrichment of all who engage in international trade, is thus God's agent, throwing open the doors of opportunity for the Gospel of the divine Son. An increasing sense in the Church of the crying needs of this sinful world, with a keener conviction of the obligation put by God on his people, is another hopeful sign of the times. Never in Christian history were the harvest fields more white on which the divine Lord bids his disciples look. To realize the exceeding whiteness of these fields and, in a strength that is inspired from above, masterfully to reap these harvests of souls immortal is the supreme mission of the Church as the bells of the twentieth century ring in the steeples. Despite the formality and worldliness existing in the present Church, the growing desire to perform personal Christian work and the increasing feeling of responsibility for one's brother are omens of encouragement. It would seem that God is fitting his people for some great era of evangelism.

For, with those who are alert and watching the sky for the appearance of the cloud like a man's hand, the signs are plentiful that the expected "showers of blessing" are near. With many there is perhaps the conviction that a great revival, world-wide in its extent and glorious in its transforming results upon society, is about to occur. The "forward movement," having its origin in London, but now advanced in some measure to some of the leading cities of the Western World, is the beginning of a more earnest evangelistic work among the degraded of our great centers of population. The wonderful signs of promise in India foretell the near turning of a great nation to the Lord. Christianity is drawing near its zenith brightness—a brightness that will be followed by no westering sun and no settling night.

PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.

THE supremacy of man over the forces of nature is an inalienable mark of advance in the world's civilization. Having been promised large dominion in the earth by the mouth of Jehovah himself, in the creative time, his sovereignty upon this high authority is undisputed and unchanging. The condition of the primitive man, it is true, was not always advanced as regards his relation to many of the powers of the natural world. The race has had its infancy in respect to its utilization of many of the gifts of nature, its knowledge of the arts and sciences, its ability to cope with the hostile forces of the physical world. The romantic stories of human ignorance and insufficiency, in that primeval time, are not without their keen interest. Ignorant of the art of metallurgy, man fabricated his first implements from stone. Unskilled in architecture, his first houses were but rude hovels. Untutored in the remedial and restorative qualities of different herbs and medicaments, he wore amulets to ward off disease and resorted to crude experiments to induce recovery. Powerless in the face of roaring hurricanes, of beating storms, and of sudden lightnings, he could do naught else than hide himself away from these terrors of the air. Believing in goblins, gnomes, and demons, he resorted to fetich worship and muttered his incantations against the spirits of evil. If there seems an element of the grotesque in these wierd experiences of our common ancestors, there is also something pitiable in this helplessness and fearfulness in the face of the opposition of nature.

But man has entered more fully since that pristine time into the enjoyment of his limitless heritage. To attempt the story of the progress which has taken place in scientific knowledge, the development of the many useful arts wherein the world is daily blessed, or the advance in terrestrial discovery is to undertake an impossible review. Man would seem to be in the large exercise of that regal authority which was promised him in Eden by the Lord Jehovah. If the divine prophecy was primarily that of future dominion over the brute creation only there has nevertheless come with it a domination of the invisible and purely immaterial forces of the physical world which is most satisfactory. Within the last century, and even within the last few decades, the triumph of the human mind over matter has rapidly progressed. Whatever may be said of the theory that the "lost arts" are many, the race was never so far advanced in the utilization of the gifts of the material world for its convenience and luxury. And it is in harmony with the common desire, as well as in unison with the current statements of men, to say that the ultimate has not yet been reached. The king is to rule over a still wider empire. If Columbus, four centuries ago, made the discovery of any new continent impossible, in that he found the only hemisphere which was undiscovered, there are yet geographical explorations to be made which are worthy of men's undertaking. The regions of the arctic and antarctic are not yet fully known; the territories of Central Africa need a fuller exploration. The uttermost secret in materia medica and in surgery has not yet been learned. The ocean will narrow, with the progress in the use of steam, to the width of an inconsequential river. Electrical application is yet in the experimental stage; in some coming time this giant force will confess its master. It is enough to suggest these many lines of future achievement. Man is to be the victorious force in nature. Matter is dormant; mind is alert and ambitious. Matter is transitory and changing; mind is eternal. Matter is pliant in some superior hand; mind has the instinct as well as the prophecy of final dominion.

LUTHER is immortal. The recent rededication of the ancient Schlosskirche, at Wittenberg, Germany, is a noticeable event in the current religious history of the Fatherland. About this church, which was begun in 1439 and completed in 1499, most interesting traditions gather. "In 1760," says an historic note, "it was seriously injured by bombardment, and it suffered in the same manner in 1813-1814. It was first restored in 1814–1817, and has now, owing to Emperor William's generosity, been again restored. On the north side of the church were the wooden doors to which Luther affixed his theses. These doors were burned in 1760, but were replaced in 1858 by metal doors, ten feet in height, presented by Frederick William IV. They bear the original Latin text of Luther's theses. Under a brazen slab in the Schlosskirche lies the body of Luther." Romantic is the story of the present rededication, which took place in this historic sanctuary and was participated in by the emperor and empress, with the Protestant princes of Germany, the representatives of foreign Protestant sovereigns, the high Protestant clergy of the empire, the ministers of State, and many military and civil officers. In the presence of the best blood that Germany can boast, in Church or State, the name of the great reformer was again taken in reverence upon the lip and his lasting work recalled. Overlooking, however, the details of this most important celebration, the value of right posthumous influence is a practical teaching which it is a privilege to point out. Some men live in the tyrannic governments they establish and leavé to their successors; some in the mischievous systems of philosophy they teach their disciples; some in the devastation they work with their cruel swords. But Luther, with many great religious and social reformers, lives in the blessings which he has given to the world. He was a great man in his integrity notwithstanding the depreciation of the Romish Church, great in his fearlessness, great in his industry, and great in his influence while alive. But, so far as Luther living may be compared with Luther dead, his greatness increases with every century. It was the value of the institution to which he has given his name that was the fundamental impulse to the present rededication of the Schlosskirche. Of this the emperor himself gave evidence in his address at the banquet following the religious services, when he declared that the edifice was not only a memorial, but also "an expression of divine blessing through the Protestant Church." Unselfishly working out a system of theological belief which seemed to him in consonance with the Holy Scripture, and heroically teaching, in those days of penances and indulgences, that salvation is by faith alone, Luther has blessed Germany and the world as he never dreamed. Probably the most enduring influence for good is that which is unsought and even unexpected. It is the part of manhood so to labor in the field of service which opportunity gives. To all there may not come a chance to work a world-wide reform. But from the life of each who so labors some good influence will remain, and mayhap the mention of men, when he has ceased to live upon the earth.

LIKE some giant of evil, defiant of the forces of righteousness, the possible desecration of the Lord's day at the World's Fair looms up once more before the American people in its colossal proportions. The congratulations of the friends of the Christian Sabbath, and of the advocates of its observance, over the last congressional decision to close the gates of the Exposition on the holy day, seem to have been prematurely made. Evil is not so easily thwarted in its mischievous purpose. All signs go to show that the friends of a lax Sunday observance are on the alert. Apparently as deeply concerned as the defenders of Sabbath sanctity, they have enlisted the secular press of the land in their interests, are triumphantly quoting the unexpected advices of certain well-known and honored prelates and divines of the American Church in favor of Sunday opening, and are sending broadcast for signatures petitions to the Congress of the United States to reconsider the action already taken directing Sabbath rest. Added to which instances of intemperate zeal, the liberal position taken by some of the directors and officers themselves of the Exposition would indicate the trend of influence that is untiringly at work to bring about a reconsideration of congressional action.

To the arguments in favor of Sunday opening it is probable that little can be added which is new. Yet the one argument whose constant repetition would seem worthy of a better cause is that the closing of the Exposition on the Lord's day will "deprive millions of the American people" of all its advantages, and the interests of these unfortunate "millions" forsooth become the watch-cry on which the sordid, speculative, secularized, and religionless leaders of the liberal movement hope to ride on to success. Nor is it probable that any new consideration in the new discussion which is near will be added to the many arguments which have already been advanced in favor of Sabbath closing. All the reasons for Sunday closure, based on the Old Testament commandment and the New Testament reiteration of the divine law, lodged in the scientific demands for one rest day in seven, or found in various prudential and even commercial considerations, have been advanced with a cumulative force that cannot be surpassed. Without allusion, therefore, to the various lines of argument that have been advanced for the maintenance of the Christian Sabbath, it is rather the enduring evil results of such a proposed Sunday desecration which seem particularly alarming. The increased number of visitors at the Exposition, as the result even of a modified Sunday opening, and the consequently increased revenues to the directors of the Exposition, would be a most doubtful benefit in comparison with the mischievous results that would ensue. The aftermath of the summer desecration of 1893 would be a perpetual desecration of the Lord's day in American practice, long after the Exposition has become a receding incident in the national history. Already has the breaking down of the great regard for the holy day which prevailed in the formative times of our national history become an evident and grievous fact to all who cherish the institutions of Christianity. But in all the history of the American republic there has been no period so critical as regards the perpetuation of Sabbath sanctity. All the interests of the holy day, with its traditions of sanctuary blessing, its benison of rest to tired brains and hands, and its promised rewards for continued observance, are in jeopardy. The proposal of the directors of the Exposition to hold religious services on the grounds of the fair for the benefit of the jostling Sunday crowds who may gather there is but a sop thrown to Cerberus. The suggestion should be rejected with disdain by the denominations of the land. Its enforcement would be a species of Jesuitical practice to which no Protestant body should lend its support. But meanwhile, in the renewed agitation over the Sunday opening of the Exposition, every Christian disciple throughout the republic should give the protest of his prayers, his signature, and his cooperation against the religious profanation which is proposed.

The English and American Societies for Psychical Inquiry are prosecuting an important work. Even on the materialistic theory that man does not live beyond the tomb, the study of mental operations and their results would be surpassed by no line of investigation. But on the theory of a future existence the practical value that attaches to the notice of psychological phenomena goes hand in hand with its exceeding charm. It would be strange if men were careful to learn the mysteries of terrestrial life, but were incurious concerning the structure and destiny of mind. It would be passing strange if men were to view the daily procession of their fellows into the spirit world and ask no question as to their experiences in the unseen. Psychical inquiries, on the contrary, in a sense appear the most important of all investigations, since it is more necessary to know man than the material tabernacle wherein for a little he resides; and the pursuit of these lines of research would seem to be prosecuted with too little rather than too much zeal. The proposed psychical congress at Chicago, in 1893, prosecuted as it will doubtless be in a reverent spirit, is significant in possibilities. It may be that Mr. Stead indulged in superlative expectations when in a recent interview he declared: "I can only say that the invisible world is to the nineteenth century what the western hemisphere was to the fifteenth." Yet it is at least possible that the ultimate fact has not been learned, consistent with biblical revelation, regarding psychical structure and manifestations.

MINISTERIAL INDIVIDUALITY.

RECENTLY one minister was heard to remark to another, "You are a typical Methodist preacher." The remark was intended as a compliment. The writer so understood it, but failed to appreciate its value as such. Every nationality has some physical or mental characteristic, or peculiarity of custom or dress, that we have learned to recognize at sight. No one mistakes a Caucasian for a Mongolian. These social marks, modified by climate, customs, and civilization, serve to differentiate tribes and nations from each other. That which we find actually true in the development of nations holds good under different ecclesiastical systems. Each leaves its own impress. Certain types of men are the outgrowth of certain systems. The Romish priest is at once recognized. Our observation teaches us that to know one is practically to know all. Most of this order look as if each had been cast in the same mold.

Now, what is the typical Methodist preacher like? Have the majority so much in common that there is little to differentiate? The individuality of the man ought not to be lost in the mass. "Show yourselves men," was the demand of the prophet. Manliness is a great element of power in the ministry. Uniformity is not desirable save in the essentials of religion. Unity with diversity is God's thought. And only as we find this in methods of preaching and work may we look for the highest intellectual and spiritual development of the individual minister. Systems in themselves are nothing if we leave out the man. Christ dealt only with the man. With effete ecclesiastical systems he had no sympathy. A man was more than a sheep. A human soul was of infinitely greater importance than ritualistic observances. The right remedy for a morally sick and diseased soul was of more importance than the method of administering it. The growth of Christianity, the upbuilding of the Church, will be better accomplished through a ministry that has an individuality than through one which is all of a kind. Some ministers will be more effective as extempore speakers, others with the carefully written manuscript. Every man in his own order, wherever he can be at his best.

Solomon says, "There is no new thing under the sun." This was true at the time of its utterance, but the world has moved since then, and much that was hidden has been brought to light. The well-stored treasure-house of God's word contains things new as well as old; and with the key of knowledge the ministry must open the door and bring the treasures out of their place of concealment "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." We may not always have the power to produce new ideas or to form uncommon combinations of thought, so as to be called original, yet our individuality must not be lost in a great ecclesiastical system like ours. The man of individuality will not be taken in a crowd for somebody else. You know him wherever you see him. We do not include the crotchety character, but the minister who aims to reach the highest spiritual and intellectual development, that he may the more effectually influence the minds and hearts of those to whom he ministers the word of life, "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" which may fully equip him for the highest calling in life. A Methodist minister can and should have no higher aim than this set forth by Paul. He is not, like the Jewish rabbi, reiterating, parrot-like, the utterances of a dead past, nor is he a priest to offer sacrifices after the formula of a prescribed ritualism, but a living teacher and expounder of great truths, the representative of Him who said, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life."

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOLS FOR PASTOR-TEACHERS IN INDIA.

So eminent and careful a guide as Dr. T. J. Scott, of the Bareilly Seminary, North India, has felt the necessity of arranging for a one year course of study for the preachers from and for the depressed classes. This method is just announced by the faculty of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Saharanpur, Northwest Provinces. In the Telugu Mission of the Baptists in the south large numbers of the leading converts have been massed in such an institution. In the Nerbadda Valley District of the Bombay Conference, Dr. T. S. Johnson, presiding elder, we have been favored with the establishment, seven months ago, of a training school for pastor-teachers. Of the forty-five pupils, about half being married men and others quite young, a dozen from the higher class are to be stationed in the villages with the beginning of the new year, after they shall have taken part in the District Conference, to be held here in December, and shall have enjoyed their first Christmas entertainment. None of them were in the Christian fold previous to the 29th of September, 1890, when the success began which has extended into scores of villages. It has been impossible, we being almost without helpers to go among these villages, to do much for the converts until workers are somewhat qualified. This waiting has been a painful experience, but we remember the command, "Tarry."

In the largeschool house near the town of Narsinghpur—a part of the property which came to us a year ago, when Bishop Thoburn took this station and district from the Swedes—these men and lads are, in the forenoons, taught reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography; but half of the time is devoted to the Scriptures. Here the drill is of the most painstaking character—statement, question, memorization, repetition, rehearsal day after day in the basal facts of man's condition and the provisions for his salvation, as stated chiefly in the books of Moses, the Gospels, and the Acts. The lower larger class is instructed by a brother from the Bareilly Theological School, and supervised by the principal, H. W. Butterfield, Esq., who gives his strength to the higher class, to get them prepared, as largely as possible, for the work which is so immediately before them. Yesterday these supplied themselves, by purchase, with an outfit for learning Roman-Hindi: they have been of late mastering the Roman letters from the blackboard. With ability to read the Lucknow paper of our Church they will come in touch with the thoughts of our advanced native brethren, and a wide literature will open before them. Some are learning English out of school hours. This leads to respect being given them by the educated native gentlemen, who are numerous in this civil and literary center and in this enlightened district.

Wives of workers have a day school. Evenings are employed always in the means of grace used by the people called Methodists—class, prayer, Sunday school teachers' and Epworth League meetings. Debates are had, with compulsory division, on such subjects as touch our interests here and now. Last night it was, "Is it well to buy and sell wives?" To-night it will be, "Is it admissible under any circumstances to have more than one wife?" In contests in Bible questions, in which all take delight, sides are chosen, and twenty-five face twenty-five.

Out of their pittance they are buying libraries, consisting of the various forms of the Scriptures, Church history, the Pilgrim's Progress, Barth's Scripture History, and numerous tractates, prepared by missionaries as to the heathen and Islam faiths and the points of Christian doctrine. In an appeal just at hand, Dr. E. W. Parker says that we must educate and train our workers if we are to prevent superstition from lodging in the new native Church. Friends can have representatives in the school at thirty dollars a year, and in the Christian Boys' Boarding School at half of this amount.

DEFINITION OF FREE WILL.

FREE WILL is a mental or spiritual development which enables the possessor to act according to an ideal, regardless of fleshly inclination; it is the opposite to free appetites or desires. Born into a world governed, or sought to be governed, by sacred and civil law, man has not free will except in so far as his individual inherited tendencies may incline him to conform to existing restrictions, which vary according to the interpretation put upon them by different denominations of believers or different authorities. Inherited or acquired tendency to act contrary to such laws is man's limitation toward free will. It is a power to be developed in and by the individual through the right use of God's law or laws (not mysterious but natural) made to effect such an end. If earthly life has a definite purpose it must be to develop this power. The office of sacred and civil law is to direct and aid its development. The degree of free will possessed by an individual is to be measured by his thoughts and their fruit—his acts, taking as a standard his accepted ideal of religion and ethics. Fruit is the ultimate measure of anything good or evil.

Inherited tendency and effective environment determine man's ideals. In time past priests (heathen and other) have mystified man's relation to the Creator. In an enlightened age "mysticism" cannot flourish, because it is plain that what any man knows he can make plain to others, and what cannot be so made plain is not a matter of duty in this short life. with so much to overcome. Man may labor to search out the hidden, but excepting regulations for common good, he may not dominate his fellow-man regarding matters in the domain of speculation.

To develop an ideal free will we must have ideal heredity and environment, as well as an accepted ideal of religion. Until then we must judge the Christian by his ideal, the Mohammedan by his, the Buddhist by his, others by theirs.

A FIELD FOR DEACONESSES.

THE letter on the above-named subject, by Rev. W. P. Odell, and the editorial comment in the September-October number of the Review, emphasized a very important matter, not only as related to the home work, but much more so when applied to the foreign field. The ever increasing work of the pastor, and his need of help, are duly emphasized in their various phases. Macaulay says, "One concrete illustration is more intelligible and memorable than a thousand abstract propositions." I will therefore give a concrete illustration from Calcutta: Two years ago I came to India to become pastor of the English-speaking church in Calcutta. This is a central church, with a wide and largely scattered congregation, and it is doing many kinds of work. At last watch-night service we had written reports from fifteen different departments, and then the chairman of the meeting, Bishop Thoburn, said: "I would suggest, in order to show what this church is really doing, the addition of a few more reports. For instance, the local missionary society, the grogshop work which has been carried on for sixteen years. I think the grogshop work of this church is ahead of any in America. And to that I would add the work of tract distribution, and to that, the fellowship bands."

One year after I became pastor of this church Dr. McCoy, who was presiding elder of the Calcutta district, died, and I was, without being relieved of the pastorate, made presiding elder, which involved, in addition to the usual work of a presiding elder, the secretaryship of two large schools, for which I have ever since, in addition to almost endless correspondence, had to collect monthly rent deficiencies on one of the schools.

Just about the time of Dr. McCoy's death a Deaconess Home was established in Calcutta, which has taken up a great variety of work; but one deaconess, Miss Maxey, from London, O., was appointed "Pastor's Assistant," and I do not exaggerate when I say that that appointment has saved the parent Missionary Society the expense of house rent and the salary of a missionary as presiding elder of this district for the past four years, for without the assistance of a deaconess the double work would have been impossible. The deaconess aids me by helping to care for the probationers, of whom we have many, visiting the sick of the congregation, investigating the circumstances of those who appeal for help (in Calcutta their name is Legion, and enough to wear the pastor out), hunting up families who do not attend any church, organizing the ladies of the church and the young people, superintending work of the young people's societies, hunting up the absentees from the Sunday school, visiting the hospitals, distributing tracts in the hospitals, grogshops, and on the streets of the city. I will not enumerate more, but want to thus express my appreciation of the work, and encourage the societies who support the deaconesses in the foreign field. The Roman and Anglican Churches use female workers to such a large extent in their work among the European and Eurasian population in India, that it seems preeminently wise for us to have the same kind of workers. I believe the deaconesses are in the order of Providence in India.

METHODISM.

METHODISM, as an ecclesiasticism, is not a product of mechanical skill, but of living growth. Her general superintendency, her presiding eldership, her class meetings and love feasts, are essential parts of her economy, not forecast by wise ecclesiastics, and framed into the system by force of legislation, but suggesting themselves as practical expedients to men who were themselves too busy in soul-saving to theorize on church government. The result is, that Methodism has had a century of phenomenal growth, and her methods have been copied, with necessary modifications, by most of the other denominations, until the lines of demarkation, which in the days of our fathers were very prominent, are now almost wholly obliterated. We have not only given to others, but we have greatly improved ourselves. In very many respects the Methodism of the twentieth century will come to her task relatively much stronger than did the Methodism of the nineteenth century.

Her schools and colleges, her publishing interests, her great connectional movements, the increased general intelligence of her people, and particularly her care for the children and youth, are all elements of strength recently put on. It would be difficult for the most sanguine son of the Wesleys to predict what achievements await us in the next quarter of a century. We must not, however, forget the secret of our past success, nor discard the use of means which God has so signally honored.

In our preaching we must recognize the immanent peril of sin, as well as the power of the Gospel to save. We must hold to regeneration, justification, sanctification, and the witness of the Spirit. As to our peculiar usages, we must hold on to them. I can only speak of our love feasts.

1. Keep the announcement of the quarterly meeting before the people.

2. Always have special Saturday service, with altar exercises at night.

3. Let nothing interfere with the regular Sabbath morning love feast. If the Sunday school is at that hour let it change hours for that occasion.

This may not be very popular in some places, but it is not popularity we should seek, but the pentecostal fire. Let us not forget to calculate on the manifestation of the wonderful presence of God. D. G. STRONG.

THE ITINERANTS' CLUB.

PRACTICAL.—THE COURSE OF STUDY FOR THE NEXT QUADRENNIUM.

By the law of the Church the duty of designating the course of study to be pursued by the candidates for our ministry is assigned to the bishops. They determine not only the subjects of examination, but also the books which the candidates are to study and to read both for admission to Conference and for ordination. The new Discipline contains the course which they deem desirable and necessary at this time. It is to be presumed that it represents what they regard as the minimum of requirement, since they omit some departments which under different circumstances they would undoubtedly include. A brief notice of the several studies which they have laid down is not out of place in the department of the Review devoted to the Itinerants' Club. The first subject mentioned is the "Common English Branches." One is inclined to ask whether the knowledge of these should not be taken for granted. They belong to the common school, and it seems strange to require these of a young man who has subsequently passed the academy, the college, and the theological seminary. And yet it is possible that too much may be taken for granted in these particular studies.

There is great danger of young preachers knowing the uncommon English branches to the neglect of the common English. Grammar and geography are supposed to be common English studies, and yet how few are masters of them. It is not meant by this that few are acquainted with the rules of grammar and with the names of the chief countries and cities of the world, as well as their general location and condition. But how few really write good English and know the geography of the world in any practical sense. The study of English has been greatly neglected hitherto, and is now assuming its proper position in our institutions of learning. The ability to speak and to write the language, in which they are to preach, with accuracy and force is therefore rightly placed first in the list of subjects for examination in order to gain admission to an Annual Conference.

Some years ago a church committee asked a friend to aid them in securing a pastor for the next Conference year. He asked them what kind of minister they wanted. One of them promptly replied, "We want a man that talks good grammar, anyhow." This particular desire was the more remarkable because both were uneducated men and technically ignorant of English grammar. It may have grown out of the fact that their pastor had been criticised in this respect, and they desired to rectify it in the case of the next pastor. If any young man is disposed to criticise and to treat lightly this part of the examination let him consider carefully before doing so.

The knowledge of the English language and the ability to write and speak it with accuracy and force are fundamental to a well-furnished, successful minister. It does not follow from this statement that men of extraordinary natural gifts and spiritual power may not succeed in being eminently useful in saving souls although they break all literary laws, for many instances can be cited where this has been the case; but it is safe to say that it seriously mars the influence and usefulness of the most devoted men.

Nor is it true that this defect is found solely among those who have had very limited educational advantages. It is not uncommon to find students who are well acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew quite defective in their knowledge of English. They neither write with precision nor speak with correctness. It is often a matter of wonder how a man can read Greek so well and speak English so badly. The fault does not lie with the study of the classics, but with the neglect of classical English. Indeed, it shows the neglect of the study of the grand English of our English Bible, which is the great protector of our Anglo-Saxon tongue. The ancient classics have a molding influence; their tendency is to elevate the style, but they cannot be a substitute for the study of one's native tongue. The ability to use well the English language will atone for many other defects. Indeed, without it all other attainments, however varied and extensive, are rendered practically useless.

It is to be hoped that the Itinerants' Club will be a stimulus to the wise as well as the more careful study of English. It is not enough for a student to know the rules of grammar; this is well; but he must be familiar with the masters of style. He must not omit the earlier English. Addison and Goldsmith are still masters. Dean Stanley, among the moderns, will repay careful and critical reading. The poetry of Wordsworth and Tennyson and of our own Bryant and Longfellow and Whittier will be found very stimulating and helpful. Milton remains a monument of classical English, but it has been often remarked that all praise "Paradise Lost" while few read it. It is not so well to study brilliant but abnormal writers. Johnson, Thomas Carlyle, and Macaulay wielded pens of great fascination, and their fame as writers is secure; but it may be doubted whether they should be studied as models. They lack that simplicity which is the charm of the choicest productions, whether of art or of literature. Models of clear Anglo-Saxon style will well repay study. But this first topic of examination has occupied already too much space, and the discussion of other subjects is reserved until the next number.

EXPOSITORY.—"THE LIKENESS OF SINFUL FLESH."

(Rom. viii, 3.)

The necessity of a careful study of the nomenclature of St. Paul is everywhere apparent in his writings. The depth of his profound argument can only be understood by those who have mastered the terminology which he employs. In the previous number of the Review "The Law of the Spirit" was discussed. Equally difficult, and at the same time equally important, is the phrase, "likeness of sinful flesh."

The proposition of the verse of which it forms a part (Rom. viii, 3), is that God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. The doctrine of the incarnation is here affirmed, or rather assumed. It is worthy of note how constantly the apostle takes for granted this cardinal doctrine of our faith. In his conception the doctrine was so deeply rooted in the belief of the Church that a mere reference without extended explanation was sufficient. In his summary of the faith of the early Church in 1 Cor. xv, 1-8, he does not mention the incarnation, but the crucifixion, evidently regarding the former as assumed in his statement of the latter. This is the great presupposition in the New Testament. Historically declared by the synoptists, it is distinctly affirmed by the evangelist John (John i, 14), "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us."

Paul, in 1 Tim. iii, 16, reaffirms it in language equally strong. "God was manifest in the flesh," or to the same effect in the Revised Version, "He who was manifested in the flesh." In like manner Heb. ii, 14, says, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." The last passage states more specifically than the others the constituents of Christ's humanity.

It is also assumed that in his incarnate nature Christ was sinless. Passages of Scripture might readily be multiplied to prove this. The announcement was made to the Virgin Mary, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i, 35). Also in Heb. vii, 26, we read, "Who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners."

The absolute holiness of Jesus is not only declared, but everywhere implied in the New Testament. It is an axiom of our Christian faith. But how is his holiness related to his human body, which is here designated as "sinful flesh?"

The unity of nature between man and his Redeemer is clearly revealed. It became him in all things "to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (Heb. ii, 17).

Compare this passage with the one in Romans which we are considering: "God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh."

Both passages involve his incarnation and suffering as necessary to secure for man reconciliation with God. When we proceed to analyze these and other similar passages we find some propositions of great significance, closely related to our present inquiry:

1. In Hebrews and Romans Christ is represented as God's Son (Heb. i, 2; Rom. viii, 3).

2. This Son of God assumed human nature in its completeness. "Made like unto his brethren" (Heb. ii, 17); "Likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii, 3).

3. In his condition of humanity he by his death made reconciliation for mankind possible.

4. His atoning act made provision for the restoration of man to purity and to favor with God.

These propositions, if legitimately drawn, show that the passage in question merely affirms that Christ in his assumption of human nature did so with a definite purpose. It omits, however, any statement attempting to explain how he could be sinless and yet be united with a nature which is described as "sinful flesh."

Various explanations have been attempted by exegetes. 1. "In and by the miraculous conception it (human nature) is perfectly sanctified, so that though it is 'sinful flesh,' or corrupt human nature in Mary the mother, it is the 'holy thing,' or perfect human nature in Jesus the child."—SHEDD, Commentary. In other words, his assumption of human nature purified the corrupt nature with which he became united.

Another explanation is that of Beet, to the effect that "the material of Christ's body was not really, but only apparently, a flesh of sin." By this of course is meant that his body was an ordinary human body, that it appeared like sinful flesh, but that in reality his whole nature was without sin. Although clothed in human form and subject to human desires and aspirations, he was nevertheless so animated with the Holy Spirit that there was in these desires and aspirations no element of sin. This could not be affirmed of any merely human being, because in them there was no such indwelling presence. Thus St. Augustine says: "We may not say that anything is impossible when the power of the Most High is present; we may not think of human frailty when there is the fullness of the Deity." The word "likeness" here employed is the same word found in Phil. ii, 7, "And was made in the likeness of men." These two passages of Scripture, proceeding from the same author, are manifestly intended to convey the same meaning. Although he was in the "likeness of sinful flesh," he was without sin.

It seems necessary, then, to advance beyond the views already given. He was not only sinless in keeping the flesh in subjection by the Holy Spirit dwelling in him, but sinless in the sense of being pure in his essential nature and essence. In other words, he took upon himself the nature of man in his sinless and unfallen condition, and therefore the likeness of sinful flesh involved no element of sin. The mode of this assumption is as impossible to explain as is the incarnation itself. The possibility of such a union of the divine with the human, as well as the temptability of a sinless nature, is a philosophical question with which exegesis is not directly concerned. We may, however, say that the parallel employed by St. Paul between Adam and Christ, so admirably drawn both in Romans and in 1 Corinthians, is significant in the light of this interpretation. Irenæus evidently regards this as the nature of the incarnate Christ. His language is: "He therefore had flesh and blood, not of a different kind from what men have; but he gathered into himself the very original creation of the Father, and sought that which was lost."

THE PRESERVATION OF MATERIALS.

THE following contribution from Brother Hartley is in continuation of a subject already discussed in the "Itinerants' Club," but always of interest and practical importance to students and sermon-makers:

EDITOR ITINERANTS' CLUB: I have for over four years followed a method of indexing my reading similar to that suggested by Brother E. A. Hoyt in the September–October Review, and find it increasingly helpful. Soon after I began to wish for some plan whereby I might also have at command all I had in my library bearing on different passages of Scripture. It was some time before I was able to supply the want, but the inconvenience I often experienced convinced me that an ever-increasing amount of material was slipping away. I finally adopted a system that has so far proved satisfactory, and I give it for the benefit of any others who have felt a similar need.

I procured a suitable book, and so divided it as to give a sufficient number of pages to each book of the Bible, in the order in which they occur. Eight pages are for Genesis, and in the upper corner of each page I have designated in red ink the chapters to which the page is devoted—Genesis 1–6 on the first page, Genesis 7–12 on the second, etc., ad finem. Whenever in my reading I find anything of help relating to any Scripture passage I turn to the appropriate page in my index; in the margin at the left of the page I indicate the chapter and verse, following with the reference to the book and page where such exposition or illustration may be found. Thus, on the first page of my index I find the entry, 1. 28. L. F. 330, and I know that on page 330 of Professor Townsend's Lost Forever I will find something relating to Gen. 1. 28; also, 3. 15. W. I. ii, 190–3, which refers me to pages 190–193 of the second volume of Watson's Institutes. The figures indicating the chapter and verse are always underscored, and the entire entry is with black ink.

I have in a smaller book a catalogue of my library, but in this index I prefer to designate the book by the initials of its title rather than by its catalogue number, because most generally the initials will suggest the title, when the number would not, but would necessitate the trouble of referring to the catalogue. In the forepart of the book the edges were already cut for lettering, and in these pages I have the names of the books, together with the corresponding initials. If in the entry above referred to I fail to recollect L. F., I turn to L of the index in the forepart of the book, and among other things I find L. F.—Lost Forever. I use the same abbreviations for my Index Rerum as for this Scripture index. Some in adopting this plan may find it convenient to modify it in some particulars, but I believe that some such method will prove valuable to any who may try it.

FOREIGN RÉSUMÉ.

SOME LEADERS OF THOUGHT.

RICHARD ADELBERT LIPSIUS.

In the death of Lipsius the University of Jena and the theological world have suffered a great loss. He had held various positions in the educational work in Germany, being at one time professor in Vienna, where he greatly influenced the development of evangelical Christianity. Both as a lecturer and author Lipsius exhibited a certain self-consciousness amounting almost to self-conceit, and as a personality he was marked by some unfortunate weaknesses. But his knowledge of philosophy and theology was enormous. There is scarcely a department of theology which has not felt the influence of his publications, and he was almost equally great as exegete, historian, and doctrinal theologian. In his early life he adhered to the so-called "Mediating Theology," but gradually and increasingly he drifted to the left wing of theological thought, although toward the very last he returned somewhat to a more positive position. But while he was in the main negative in his theology he supported his assaults upon the citadel of confessionalism with so much learning and ingenious reasoning that he can but command the respect of scholars of every tendency of theological opinion. He was never flippant, never declamatory nor denunciatory, but based his judgments upon careful, honest research, and expressed himself generally in a judicial tone. His contributions to the scholarship of the theological world are invaluable; and by his profound investigations and honest statement of results he has started questions which will perhaps never cease to affect the thought of the religious world. He was very active in combating Romanism. Like nearly every true negative theologian, his chief energy was spent in attacks upon the papal system, though not always avowedly so. It is this which so often renders the German theologian odious in the sight of the ardent adherents of traditional Protestantism; for frequently the German thinks he sees in Protestantism exactly the same fault in principle, although differently developed, as in Romanism. And to him it is as truly offensive in the former as in the latter. Lipsius was as well an ardent Christian as a zealous Protestant and theologian. Christianity was not, to him, a mere series of historical facts sustaining a certain religious theory which could be made the subject of scientific investigation and philosophical reflection; it was also a supply for the needs of his soul; and while somewhat different in its contents, yet his religious life was as intense as that of most Christians.

DR. AUGUST DILLMAN, PROFESSOR IN BERLIN.

We have here an undoubted leader of thought, a man who will continue to influence the criticism of the Old Testament for decades to come. In Germany he is not regarded as particularly radical, although he is denied a place among the Conservatives. With the views of Wellhausen concerning the Pentateuch he is at variance, although it is doubtful whether his opinions on that subject would be more acceptable to the average American student. In order to illustrate what positions a moderate German critic may take, we give a brief outline of Dillman's views concerning Isaiah. According to him only chapters i–xxxv contain genuine Isaian parts; and of these chapters several are interpolations of a much later origin—some as late as the post-exilian period. The first thirty-five chapters were, therefore, not finally edited until after the exile. The second part of the book, containing chapters xxxvi–xxxix, also originated much later than Isaiah's time. So also the third part, consisting of chapters xl–lxvi, was composed by some one of whose very name we are ignorant, but who lived at the close of the period of the exile. The impossibility of its Isaian origin he argues at length on the grounds that the historical background forbids such a supposition, presupposing, as it does throughout, the Babylonian exile as then existent, and that the ideas of this portion are thoroughly distinct from those of the unquestioned Isaian portions. He mentions, also, the literary style as a reason for rejecting this portion of Isaiah, but lays most stress upon the first two arguments. Dillman is all the more willing to yield the genuineness of these predictive parts of the Book of Isaiah because he denies the fulfillment of several of the undoubted Isaian predictions. We have not at all given the argument of Dillman in its force, nor have we space here to do more than point out that on the supposition of true prophecy his exact prevision of the exilian and post-exilian periods would not be surprising. This, of course, merely throws the question back to a discussion of whether Isaiah's predictions were divinely inspired. This Dillman unhesitatingly denies. As to the difference between the ideas of the former and the latter half of the book it may be said that if written at a different period of Isaiah's life this would not be wonderful.

RECENT THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

THE SCIENTIFIC TREATMENT AND PRACTICAL IMPROVEMENT OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

This is another of the series of published treatises of a theological conference at Giessen. It is by Pastor R. Eibach. The author announces and defends three theses: 1. The scientific treatment of the Holy Scriptures seeks to discover their peculiar significance for Christianity without regard to any dogma relative to their origin and churchly value; 2. The scientific treatment of the Holy Scriptures on the one hand experiences increased activity and a distinct deepening of method from the faith of the Church, and on the other purifies and clarifies that faith; 3. It furnishes, therefore, the absolutely necessary condition upon which the Holy Scriptures can be made serviceable to the spiritual needs of the congregation, and once more brought into contact with the understanding of our times. The treatise is brief but weighty. It is the attempt of a believer in the latest results of scientific theology to show that the practical value of the Scriptures is not destroyed, nor, perhaps, diminished, by their scientific treatment. If this could be made clear everybody would be content to let the critics alone. One can but sympathize with the ultimate object of all true criticism—to discover the origin of each book and the meaning of every portion of each book. Yet history shows that the holding of certain articles of faith as living, burning truth, is essential to that form of Christianity which is alone likely to bring this world under the scepter of Christ. Eibach affirms that biblical criticism does not affect any such doctrine. He would create the impression that it leaves the teachings of Scripture essentially as it finds them, but simply demonstrates that their origin is not so divine as to be without mixture of human influences and errors. In his second thesis, however, he seems to admit that while the scientific treatment of the Bible goes its own way unmolested by the faith of the Church, and the faith of the Church takes its own independent course, yet they do in fact mutually influence each other. If the faith of the Church is affected by the results of the scientific treatment of the Bible, then Christianity can only stand if these results in some way secure the authority of the Bible, unless Christianity is to be something else than it has been for eighteen hundred years. There was a Christianity prior to the New Testament, but none prior to Christ and the apostles and their teachings. If these records do not at least contain a trustworthy account of their lives and teachings our faith has no sure foundation. Those who make practical use of the Bible look with the greatest solicitude, therefore, to the findings of its critics.

CHRISTIAN ESCHATOLOGY, BY DR. LEONHARD ATZBERGER, PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN MUNICH.

THIS is a thoroughly Roman Catholic work in all its doctrinal presuppositions and in development; but it is well worthy the study of all who would know the questions at issue. The author defends the superiority of the eschatology of revelation to that of human philosophy and the religion of nature, but holds that Christian eschatology need not be founded in all its parts upon the Bible, since tradition is also a source of authority in the Roman religion, and hence all that is demanded is that eschatological doctrines do not contradict Holy Writ. It is a striking fact that this apologetic tone is especially employed in connection with the doctrine of purgatory. For it is here, more than anywhere else, that Roman Catholic eschatology stands in open conflict with that of Protestantism. However, Atzberger denies that the Protestant view of the state of the soul after death is more scriptural than the Romanist, and makes a serious attempt to show that he has the Bible on his side. We are more interested, however, with his doctrinal than with his biblical defense of purgatory. It runs essentially as follows: Only the absolutely pure can go to heaven. There are some Christians who are not yet wholly redeemed from the corruption of sin at death, and who therefore cannot go to heaven at once. It is inconceivable that these should be condemned to hell; hence they must be consigned to a place where they can complete the work of redemption within themselves. The soul purifies itself, or is purified, by sufferings on account of sin. Hence the place to which the souls above described are consigned is not merely an intermediate place or state, but a place of actual infliction of sanctifying penalty, or at least of suffering. The average Protestant does not take as profound a view of sin and holiness as is here assumed. Protestants too often do not undertake to explain how the many faulty Christians who die without any apparent improvement can go straight to the world where all are perfect. Those who do undertake to explain it generally assume that in the last moments of a Christian's life God sanctifies and purifies him by his Spirit, and thus prepares him for immediate entrance to his holy presence. On the other hand, the Protestant view is free from that Christ-dishonoring doctrine of human merit, and the falsehood which attributes our sanctification to suffering instead of to the influence of the Holy Spirit. Protestantism has the truer and more evangelical principles at the base of its doctrine on this point, but it is imperatively demanded that these principles be consistently carried out to their logical consequences, and extended so as to cover all the questions involved.

THE HISTORY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT PRIESTHOOD, BY PROFESSOR BAUDISSIN, OF MARBURG.

In principle Baudissin does not differ from the rank and file of Old Testament critics in Germany, although he reserves the right to arrange details according to his own judgment. This particular work is an attempt to shed light upon the origin of the Old Testament books, or portions of books, especially of the Pentateuch, by a study of the development of the Old Testament priesthood. We here pass by the conclusions he reaches concerning the origin of the different component parts of the Old Testament, and give only the results of his investigations as to the priesthood. The Jehovistic writings of the Old Testament assume that in the patriarchal period there was no special priestly class. Moses was the first to establish such an order. It is very uncertain in what relation the priests stood to the supposed tribe of Levi. It is difficult to say whether the term Levite merely meant a person called to serve at the altar or whether the Levites were descendants of a patriarch Levi. The latter is very improbable. It is possible that there was a tribe of Levi which early disappeared, and with which the Levites came to be accidentally identified. The most probable view is that Moses established his own relatives as Levites—that is, as specially privileged to serve at the altar—and that it was a later misunderstanding which made him a son of Levi. It is quite unlikely that a whole tribe could be occupied with the affairs of the sanctuary during the journey in the wilderness. When the tribes settled in Canaan the Levites did not receive a portion of land, but were scattered over the entire population. The service at the altar was not always conducted by this priestly class, although they were preferred. According to the priestly document the sacred tent was the place of sacrifice; and according to the Jehovist it was a place where oracles were given out by Moses to every one who sought. At the sanctuary in Zion under David the priests were chosen according to the will of the king, who himself assumed the position of a superior priest, bringing offerings, imparting the liturgical benediction, and dancing before the ark of the covenant. A later psalm celebrates him, as with Melchizedek, a priest-king. The priestly document in the Pentateuch was systematized toward the end of the period of the kings, in the first part of the seventh century B. C. It is made up of older documents. It did not represent the actual service of the period, since it was not a well-rounded system, but is consistent in that it makes the clear distinction between priests and Levites. The descendants of Aaron alone are priests. The editor seems to have known, however, of descendants of Aaron who were not priests. But our space forbids us to trace his conclusions further.

AN INSTANCE OF THE CRITICAL TREATMENT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

No two New Testament critics worthy of the name will proceed alike; yet a somewhat extended example of the method of one critic will give the reader at least the spirit of all criticism, allowance being made for differences of the temperament of authors. The example we select is a fair average. It is the prize essay of William Brückner, on "The Chronological Order in which the Epistles of the New Testament were Composed, so far as this can be discovered from their mutual unison or diversity, and from the use of words and citations in the later which occur in the earlier letters." The general principles of this critic are exhibited in the title of the work. But we shall undertake to delineate them somewhat more in detail. He assumes that the gospels and epistles follow one another in the order of an historical development of the faith in the Church. In this he agrees, indeed, with most of the theologians of Germany, the assumption being that the New Testament writings are the product of the Christian consciousness of successive periods, and not of inspiration by the Holy Spirit. Only in this way, claims the author, can the variety of the portraitures of Jesus in the writings of the different contributors to the New Testament be understood, and only thus does the full significance of this diversity appear. In order to maintain this theory of the origin of the New Testament documents it is necessary to assume a tolerably long period of time, and not merely the brief lifetime of the apostles subsequent to their conversion. Hence he divides the letters of the New Testament into those written in the first and those written in the second century, toward the latter part of which period the later letters were written. To the objection that instead of indicating a relation of dependence of the one upon the earlier these coincidences of thought and expression are the result of accident, and to the profounder objection that instead of resulting from a literary dependence they arose from the fact that the same thoughts moved all hearts, and naturally found expression in similar language, he replies that in many cases such suppositions will not answer, because the similarity of thought and expression extends over too wide a reach of chapter and verse. The extent of the similarity demands the supposition that one borrowed thought and expression from the other. Especially does he claim that it cannot be accidental that different authors quote the very same Old Testament passages side by side. Thus both Rom. i, 24–33, and 1 Peter ii, 4–10, quote Isaiah xxviii, 16, Isaiah viii, 14, and Hosea ii, 23, and similarly in several other instances. But while he places several of the letters in the second century, and thus cuts off all possibility of their apostolic origin, he claims that we have the text of the New Testament letters essentially uncorrupted. Here he parts company with many critics who teach that the original documents were altered in the third, or perhaps even as late as the fourth century, to suit the purposes of the Church of the period, and that these alterations are so great that the original authors would no longer recognize or own them. It will be difficult to answer his argument that if such a redaction had taken place for dogmatical purposes it would have been so thorough that the diversities now existent in the New Testament would have been removed. The attempt to prove the interpolation of some of the epistles dogmatically is, he asserts, exceedingly difficult to complete. Yet he admits that some interpolations of a late date can be detected, and he assumes that some passages generally accepted as genuine are interpolations. These are the general positions of the author. But why is it necessary to assume that the diversities of doctrinal position are a chronological development? Could they not as well be accounted for on the supposition that these documents arose in different localities about the same time, and to meet the diverse wants of a variety of congregations, and that they are further modified by the personality of the author? But a critic who would thus make it possible for all the New Testament documents to be the product of apostolic pens would be no critic at all. Again, let it be observed that our critic is obliged to defend the integrity of these books because otherwise he could not maintain the dependence of one document upon another. We defy anyone to challenge the assertion that this method is an earmark of all so-called higher criticism. Furthermore, which theory shall we accept, that of our critic that we have the New Testament books in their integrity, although many of them are not of apostolic origin, or that of other critics, that our books are honeycombed with interpolations for dogmatic purposes? All are alike able men. When doctors disagree who shall decide? Until they agree we may go on securely in the belief that the New Testament is God's revelation to man.

RELIGIOUS AND EDUCATIONAL.

THE BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

It is to be regretted that this Society is compelled to report a decrease of thirty-two thousand francs for the fiscal year last past. The organization has been in existence for nearly a hundred years, and is one of the most important in Europe. At the earnest suggestion of Professor Gruetlieb they began about seven years ago to send medical missionaries to their mission fields, the first being Dr. Fisch, who went to the Gold Coast. They have now a number of hospitals, large and small, where the medical skill of European physicians is applied to the healing of native diseases with excellent effect. In the city of Calcutta they have a hospital where four thousand patients were treated in 1890. The wretched system of medical practice in vogue among the Chinese makes this form of missionary labor especially helpful there. The growth of the missions of this Society has been small, amounting in all to only 24,692 native Christians and 10,934 school pupils. When their medical work becomes fully established they will doubtless recommend themselves to the heathen as never before, and will thus make more rapid gains. It has been too long forgotten that Jesus healed the bodies as well as the souls of men in the execution of his work.

PROTESTANT ACTIVITY IN FRANCE.

VARIOUS Protestant societies in France have recently held their anniversaries. The Association for the Advancement of Sabbath Observance chose for its president a member of the Free Evangelical Church, the report was read by a Methodist, and addresses were made by pastors of the Reformed Church and by Father Hyacinthe. The Society for Jewish Missions report but two missionaries employed, one in Paris, the other in Algeria. The Temperance Society was encouraged by a report showing good progress. Its president is Pastor Theodore Monod. The Central Evangelization Society reported the opening of eight new stations, while the Sunday School Union reported slim attendance upon the Sunday school sessions and a financial deficit. The Deaconess Home celebrated its fiftieth anniversary with great rejoicing on account of prosperity. The Evangelical Association, the Methodists, the Baptists, and the McAll missions all reported good progress. The work of foreign missions has found greater favor than ever among the people the past year, and the income for this purpose increased to 474,984 francs. Two new missionaries have been sent to Zambezi, and in general Protestantism seems to flourish.

THE THIRTY-NINTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF GERMAN ROMANISTS.

THIS important gathering convened in Mayence on the 29th of last August and closed its sessions on the 1st of September. It was characterized by a remarkable hopefulness for the speedy overthrow of Protestantism and establishment of Romanism. Bishop Haffner, of Mayence, spoke against atheism, which, he declared, is furthered in the German universities and gymnasia. Freiherr von Schorlemer-Alst spoke on the socialist question, which he regarded as the most important of the present day, and the one around which everything else revolves. He affirmed that the first and only salvation from the inroads of social democracy is religion. This to him means not only the freedom and independence of the Church, but also the territorial independence of the pope, and confessional schools and education. With one accord the assembly favored the restoration of the pope's territorial independence and the return of the banished Jesuits, and the placing of the schools in the hands of the Church. Indeed, the demand was that the legislation of Germany should be conducted and based upon the law and word of God. Otherwise it was declared that Germany is approaching an abyss of irreligion and immorality which will engulf all Christian sentiment and civilization. If religion did not mean to the Roman Catholic exclusively Roman Catholicism there would be much in the sentiments of this assembly to which every true Protestant would assent.

PERSECUTIONS OF PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES IN TURKEY.

THE Mohammedans are as foolishly fanatical in their hatred of Christianity as ever. It is now admitted that the house of the missionary (Bartlett) was set on fire by a mob. The sultan had consented to the erection of the house, but the governor had set himself against it. It is declared on good authority, however, that this was not without orders from the sultan, and that two sets of orders are always issued from Constantinople, one to quiet the foreign legations, and another, with different contents, for the home government. The sultan is compelled to heed the voice of the foreign powers on the one side and of the local enmity to Christianity on the other. The Mollahs, a very strong party, the Armenian Christians, and the adherents of the Greek Church are all bitter enemies of Protestantism. It is high time that something be done to check the outrages and duplicity for which the sultan's government is responsible, and the American government ought to see to it that Turkey is brought to account for violations of the treaty rights of our missionaries in that country.

ASYLUMS FOR ALCOHOL VICTIMS IN SCHLESWIG.

THE asylum in Leipe began the year 1891 with thirteen patients, received during the year eleven others, and dismissed in all seventeen. The year 1892, on the other hand, began with seven patients in the house. The work is in part successful and in part unsuccessful. But in general it may be said that wherever a patient can be found who has the purpose to abstain wholly he does not fall again into his old habits. Many, however, are of the opinion that total abstinence is fanaticism and that moderate drinking is wisdom; others, upon the advice of some ignorant or conscienceless physician, drink for their "stomach's sake," and so keep alive the old appetite. The Germans are slow to learn that total abstinence is the only preventive for the fallen and the unfallen, but are yielding to the indubitable proof drawn from experience.

EDITORIAL REVIEWS.

SPIRIT OF THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

THE aggressive activity and political meddlesomeness of Roman Catholicism, both in America and Europe, are much noted and discussed in the leading Reviews. Thus among their October issues we find Mgr. O'Reilly, in the North American, contending with much assurance that the principles of civil and religious liberty, which are the corner stones of American institutions, require the support of Catholic parochial schools with money derived from public taxation. But Mr. O'Reilly judiciously shrinks from touching the historic fact that Romanism uses her parochial schools for the training of children in principles subversive of that religious and civil liberty which he so inconsistently invokes. It borders on audacity to ask the American public to tax itself for the maintenance of schools the main object of which is to root up the very principles which are the lifeblood of our governmental system. In the Lutheran Quarterly we have a paper on the "Reformation and Civil Liberty," which proves that when Luther wrote his famous theses Rome, true to her arrogant claim of supremacy over both the State and the individual conscience, had suppressed both civil and religious liberty throughout Europe. His theses were the seeds of that religious and civil freedom which the Romish parochial schools are planned to destroy. The Presbyterian Quarterly also discusses "Romanism and the Public Schools" in a very forcible paper, which, while rightly claiming that the safety of our republic calls for the universal education of the young in free schools, and for teaching which is patriotic, religious, and unsectarian, strongly contends that to such schools and such teaching Romanism is vindictively hostile. Her false theories compel her to be so. Her parochial schools are not simply Christian, but strictly and offensively sectarian. Hence she forbids the reading of the Bible, which, said Pius IX, "has produced more harm than benefit, is indeed the snare prepared for their [the peoples'] everlasting ruin." Hence also she proclaims herself the exclusive interpreter of the Bible. Her parochial school-teaching cannot be patriotic, because she claims a supremacy over the State, implying "power to require the State not to permit free expression of opinion." Thus the teaching in her parochial schools, both in word and spirit, must be disloyal to the State. Having sustained these points the article contends that no compromise with Rome on the school question is possible. Therefore we must maintain our Common School System intact; keeping its instruction loyal to God and to the Bible, thus fitting it to train children into good citizens. As to parochial schools, the American theory of civil and religious liberty simply demands their toleration—nothing more. In the Contemporary Review a very statesmanlike paper comments on the present "Policy of the Pope." Its keynote is that the welfare of the Catholic Church is "indissolubly bound up with the temporal sovereignty of her visible head." Guided by this secular keynote, Leo XIII is ignoring the fact that Catholics are citizens of the State as well as members of a Church. He is struggling to develop the Catholic at the expense of the man and the citizen. This struggle has involved him in much inconsistency. His political crookedness causes loud cries of disaffection to fall from the lips of Catholics in Austria, because he has been more ready to heed the anti-Catholic leaders of the French republic than the zealous Catholics of Austria, Hungary, etc. The writer of this paper, who seems to be a devoted Catholic, is deeply grieved and alarmed lest the result of the pope's policy should react against the papacy itself. His article merits close attention; for it may be that Leo's ambition to recover the temporal power is the rock on which Romanism will be wrecked, and its misled followers freed from the oppressive yoke which they are illy able to endure.

THE Presbyterian Quarterly (Southern) for October has, 1. "The Immortality of the Soul;" 2. "A Religious Estimate of Carlyle;" 3. "Romanism and the Public Schools;" 4. "A Modern Jehu;" 5. "Pentecostal Baptism;" 6. "Notes." Of these very excellent papers we note the first as a very strong presentation, by Dr. Dabney, not of the biblical but of the rational argument for the immortality of the soul. It is an able and timely article. The second paper is a candid and keen critical analysis of Carlyle's religious sentiments, and of the influence of his writings on Christian thought. It credits him with having made atheism and materialism impossible to self-respecting minds, but finds that notwithstanding his "rugged righteousness and stern incorruptibility," he lacked that experimental knowledge of the Gospel which softens the heart and beautifies the character. The fourth paper is a caustic and convincing review of Dr. Driver's Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament. Dr. Driver's assault on the Old Testament, it contends, is so unscrupulous as to justify its author in saying that, like Jehu, "he driveth furiously." This paper is eminently worth reading. The fifth article claims that the Pentecostal baptism did not consist in the gift of tongues, nor in endowment with power, but in the coming of the Holy Spirit to dwell in the souls of believers. It is suggestive, but not sufficiently clear to be conclusive and convincing.

THE Bibliotheca Sacra for October discusses, 1. "The History and Definition of Higher Criticism;" 2. "Minute Prediction and Modern Doubt;" 3. "Duality;" 4. "Driver on the Literature of the Old Testament;" 5. "Carey, the Founder of Modern Missions;" 6. "Professor Huxley versus Genesis i;" 7. "We Shall Not All Sleep;" 8. "Jonah in Nineveh." The first of these papers, after tracing the history of the phrase "higher criticism" from Eichhorn, its inventor, down to Kuenen and Dr. Briggs, finds it to be, as a term, unscientific, unstable, meaningless, and, as distinguished from lower criticism, false. The second article finds evidence of real inspiration in the minuteness of the Messianic prophecies. The third paper recognizes and illustrates the principles of duality and triality as entering into the structure of the universe, and into the Old and New Testaments. Its writer uses this fact as evidence that the former is not "a fortuitous concourse of atoms," nor the latter "a lump of conglomerate." The wisdom of a designing mind is visible through these principles both in the universe and in the Bible. The fourth paper reviews Dr. Driver's book on The Literature of the Old Testament, commending its excellent spirit and general merits, but mildly exposing the unsoundness of some of its rationalistic reasonings. The sixth paper is an eloquent and eulogistic sketch of William Carey, whom it misnames the "Founder of Modern Missions." Carey merited most of the high praise given him here, but he did not found modern missions; for the Lutheran Church had missions in India in 1705, and the Wesleyans had a working missionary society in 1784, eight years before the society founded by Carey was organized. The sixth paper sustains the order of life as given in Genesis against Mr. Huxley's objection to its geological correctness. The seventh paper successfully defends the theory of the resurrection of the sleeping dead at the end of the world, and of the translation of living believers at the time of Christ's appearing, against the notion that souls will stay in bodies until the end of time, and then be removed to a different place, namely, to heaven. Hence, when Christ appears living saints will pass without dying directly to the throne of God.

The North American Review for November has, 1. "The Presidential Campaign of 1892," by Hon. J. G. Blaine; 2. "The Scandinavian in the United States;" 3. "Politics and the Pulpit;" 4. "What Cholera Costs Commerce;" 5. "The Democratic Outlook;" 6. "Waste Products Made Useful;" 7. "How to Solve the School Question;" 8. "Swiss and French Election Methods;" 9. "Quarantine in New York;" 10. "Wanted, a New Party;" 11. "Are There Too Many of Us?" 12. "Ernest Renan;" 13. "Europe at the World's Fair;" 14. "Notes and Comments." Of these papers we note the second as being a candid statement of the number, character, influence, and political sympathies of our Scandinavian immigrants. Its writer, Professor Boyesen, while regretting their disposition to keep apart from their American neighbors, predicts that they will soon be assimilated to our people. In the third article Bishop Foss judiciously outlines the duty of the pulpit with respect to political questions. While the pulpit should avoid strictly political issues it should boldly explain and emphasize the ethical points involved in political measures. In the seventh paper Mgr. O'Reilly shows that the school question can be easily settled by letting the Catholic priesthood have its own way! But this cannot be done. The Roman Catholic school is anti-American in its teaching. There is a touch of impudence in asking Americans to provide schools for the propagation of ideas hostile to their institutions. The twelfth paper, which purports to treat of Ernest Renan, is in truth a misrepresentation of the character of Jesus, by R. G. Ingersoll, whose hatred of the King of men renders him blind to the moral grandeur of the Redeemer's mission, to the unmatched perfection of his life, and to the miraculous splendor of his deeds.

THE Globe is a "Quarterly Review of Literature, Society, Religion, Art, and Politics," published in Chicago. Its editor and principal contributor is William H. Thorne, whose aggressive spirit and slashing style suggest that, consciously, or unconsciously, he is an imitator of Carlyle. In his October number he tells his readers how he quite recently became a Roman Catholic. He was once a Presbyterian minister; then a "Cosmotheist;" and is now a Catholic layman. While putting the fetters of Romanism on his individuality it appears that he found it difficult to accept its "Mariolatry." It seems that his common sense told him that it implied Mary's omniscience. But a priest told him that "all Catholics, in praying to the Virgin or to the saints, firmly believe that God himself, in his omnipotent love, conveys our messages to the Virgin and to the saints!" This puerile idea convinced him that prayer to poor Mary, who can neither see nor hear us, is more helpful to the petitioner than prayer offered directly to the Most High! Mr. Thorne's acceptance of this irreverent and absurd conception of Jehovah's relation to such a redeemed sinner as Mary must convince thinking men that, with all his sharpness and ready wit, he is very poorly qualified to be a leader of religious thought.

THE Lutheran Quarterly for October has a scholarly historic sketch of the modes of Christian worship from apostolic to modern times. It finds no definite prescription of forms of worship in the Scriptures, but only the two divine pillars of the word, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, on which all worship rests. Varying liturgical forms were gradually introduced. These are briefly described and commented upon. The history of the liturgies in the Lutheran Church is next quite fully given. Regret for the liturgical agitations which have disturbed that body is expressed, as is also the hope that the adoption of a recently authorized Common Service will put an end to those disturbances. In another paper it is proven that "our Lutheran Church is a missionary Church." As early as 1559 Lutheran missionaries preached Christ to the Lapps and Finns; the next year they were in Russia, and in 1663 Abyssinia heard the word from their lips. In 1705 they planted a mission at Coromandel, India. The same year they sent Ziegenbalg also to India, where he translated the New Testament into the Tamil language, and after forty-five years of labor rejoiced over nine thousand converts. These, with other kindred facts, justify this writer's claim that the Lutheran Church is a missionary Church. In a paper on "The Ethical Aim of Christianity" it is clearly shown that "individual salvation" and "the renewal of society" are included in the "supreme ethical purpose of Christianity." A paper on the "Intermediate State" concludes, on questionable exegetical grounds, as we think, that the Gospel was preached by Christ in the realm of the dead, and is still preached there to all who did not hear the Gospel while living on earth; but not to those who, having heard it before death, had rejected it. A speculative theory resting on a few texts of very uncertain meaning.

THE Quarterly Review of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has thirteen excellent articles, of which we note, 1. "St. Patrick and a Glimpse of the Emerald Isle," which makes it historically clear that though St. Patrick was an ascetic monk he did not teach purgatory, adoration of the Virgin Mary, transubstantiation, papal supremacy, or other crude superstition of the existing Romish Church. 2. "A Good Book, but Obsolete," in which O. P. Fitzgerald reviews a work entitled Duties of Christian Masters, written by Bishop McTyeire when the slave power was dominant in the South. Its words to masters were good and sensible, but its underlying assumption was the innocency of slaveholding. This was the fly in that pot of ointment. Its author did not even whisper that to hold a man as a slave was in itself a sin; and, we take it, this reviewer does not accept the ethical concept of slaveholding. 3. "The Problem Solved" is a review of a book bearing that title, by Dr. G. H. Hayes, who rejects "the second blessing theory of sanctification." His view is, that the need of regeneration is not grounded on entailed spiritual corruption, which he denies, but on one's personal sin and guilt. This is removed by the grace of regeneration, in which the quickened soul is made a son and heir of God. The regenerated man, by obeying the impulses of his new life, grows up into the fullness of love, which is the essence of entire sanctification. The impression we get from this review of Dr. Hayes's book is, that while it is substantially sound in its conclusion, it is yet open to the charge of Pelagianism, and of a measure of logomachy which darkens counsel with many words.

THE London Quarterly Review for October critically reviews several recent works, such as, Life and Times of Niccolo Machiavelli, by Professor Pasquale Villari; Is Christianity an Evolution? by Lyman Abbott; An Englishman in Paris, etc. It is justly severe on Dr. Abbott's book, not only because of its serious doctrinal errors, but also because it does not recognize the Holy Spirit, nor the radical sinfulness of human nature, denies the very idea of propitiation, and changes conversion into something else. The Review finds it "a different yet not another gospel."

THE Quarterly Review of the United Brethren in Christ for October discusses, 1. "Our National Perils;" 2. "Moral Power, and How to Generate It;" 3. "Divine Healing;" 4. "The Holy Ghost;" 5. "Inspiration of the Scriptures;" 6. "The Christian Church." In the first of these papers the low character of the immigrants coming into our country, the growing lawlessness of our people, the corruption of our political life, the greed of wealth, and the wickedness of the nation are viewed as elements of impending national peril. The second paper contends that the prosperity of a nation is rooted in the spirituality and ethical purity of the Christian Church. The third paper finds the modern doctrine of divine healing to contain the seeds of fanaticism and impiety. The fourth paper is an admirable condensation of the teaching of Holy Writ concerning the office and work of the Holy Ghost. The fifth article is an argument in favor of the plenary inspiration of the Bible, in the sense that its writers were so moved by the Holy Ghost that its statements are infallibly true.

Christian Thought for October has seven thoughtful papers, of which we note one on "Recent Modifications of Darwinism," by Joseph Cook, showing that the discussions of the last quarter of this century have resulted in taking away entirely the atheistic and materialistic aspects of the theory of evolution. Another on "Richard Rothe and Social Theology," by Professor A. B. Curtis, dissects Rothe's theory of "saving society as a whole," points out its fallacies, and claims that the salvation of society can only be reached through Christ's method of individual conversions. A third article is on the "Tenement-house Evil," by R. F. Cutting, Esq. It merits the attention of all who are interested in the problem of providing fitting homes for workingmen in our large cities.

THE Edinburgh Review or Critical Journal for October favorably reviews Curzon's valuable book on Persia; strongly commends Giovanni Morelli's Italian Painters to all students of art; pronounces the Duc d'Aumale's Biography of the Princes of the House of Condi to be "a noble addition to the history of France;" discusses with much force the international importance of the Mediterranean Sea, vigorously contends against the aim of France to make it a French lake, and insists that England must maintain at all hazards her present position as the leading naval and commercial power in that historic sea. It also discusses, with much breadth of view, the vital relations which the increase or decrease of national population has to the progress or decline of civilization; and in a very scholarly paper states the conclusions which "British Criticism of the Old Testament" claims to have reached. The writer of this last paper is moderately rationalistic, yet holds that the Bible is a perfectly veracious and divinely simple record of the growth and development of God's Church.

THE Fortnightly Review for October has a slashing criticism of Mr. Huxley's Controversies, by Frederic Harrison, a doughty Positivist; a paper on "Aërial Navigation," in which Mr. Hiram Maxim confidently predicts that such navigation will be achieved in the near future; an article on "The Trades Union Congress," which students of sociology will find worth reading; a paper on "Russia and China," which shows how Chinese apathy is encouraging Russia to make further aggression on Chinese territory; and a very suggestive article on "Silver and Indian Finance," which American financiers and statesmen will do well to seriously consider.

The Contemporary Review for October has, 1. "The Policy of the Pope;" 2. "The Recent Heat Wave;" 3. "McKinleyism;" 4. "Irish Literature;" 5. "Lessons of American History;" 6. "Archbishop Magee;" 7. "The Coercion of Trade Unions;" 8. "Of Nuts and Nut-Crackers;" 9. "Equality;" 10. "The Rise of the Coal Trade;" 11. "The Message of Israel;" 12. "English Character of Canadian Institutions." Of these papers the first commends itself to thoughtful Americans who wish to comprehend the aims of the papacy. The fifth and ninth are also interesting to us as able discussions of political principles. Students of Old World literature will value the fourth paper, and those interested in the so-called higher criticism will not fail to read with care the suggestions of the eleventh article.

The American Catholic Quarterly Review for October gives large space to papers on Columbus, one of which treats Mr. Winsor and the "scientific school" very cavalierly. Its anger, though not preeminently Christian, is quite natural, inasmuch as that school has torn from Columbus that garb of sanctity with which the fancy of Romanists had clothed him. A paper on "The Church and English Liberty" is provocative of a smile, because it illustrates the desire of the Romish Church to rid herself of the record of history, which demonstrates her hostility to civil and religious liberty wherever she has had power to persecute and suppress it. In an article on "Our Parochial System" it is claimed that eight hundred thousand Catholic children, from seven to fourteen years of age, are in parochial schools! It urges the support of this system, not because it tends to make patriotic American citizens, which we know it does not, but because it makes them devout members of the Catholic Church. This, we think, is a good reason why it should not be supported by public taxation. It is an implicit concession that it is, in the strictest sense, sectarian.

The Nineteenth Century for October opens with a thoughtful paper on the Irish question, by Mr. J. E. Redmond, who contends for such a "Readjustment of the Union" as will give an Irish legislature "full and sole control of the police, the judiciary, and the land." In another article on Ireland Mr. T. W. Russell finds that notwithstanding the depletion of its population during half a century, it is still in some counties over-populated; that education is so general that the number of persons wholly illiterate in 1891 was only 18.4 per cent of the population; that mud cabins are rapidly giving place to houses of brick and mortar; that pauperism is steadily declining, albeit the number of lunatics and idiots is greater than it was ten years ago, and that the English language is being everywhere spoken. We further note a paper on "Cholera and Our Protection From It," which deserves to be widely circulated and generally read.

Harper's New Monthly for November is superbly illustrated, and filled with ably written papers. "The Holy Places of Islam," by C. D. Warner, describes the Moslem annual pilgrimages from Damascus and Cairo to Mecca and Medina, with spirited pictures of their mosques. Mr. Child conducts his readers "Along the Boulevards of Paris," imparting much pleasing information as he proceeds. F. D. Millet gives some admirable portraits of the designers of the Columbian Fair, who appear to be very fine specimens of manly beauty; and Lawrence Hutton comments on "A Collection of Death Masks." Besides these are other papers of varied interest and value, making altogether an admirable number of this always attractive magazine.——The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for October is rich in good things. Spiritual religion, theological points, literary criticism, and science are among its topics, and are all ably treated.——The English Illustrated Magazine treats of "Some Musical Conductors," "Beards and No Beards," "Clipper Ships," etc. Its illustrations are numerous, artistic, and spirited.——The Methodist Magazine (Canadian) for November has a finely illustrated descriptive paper on "The City of the Sultan," by its editor; a topographical and historical illustrated article, "Through Roumania," by Dr. Sternberg; an appreciative sketch of Whittier, by Dr. Withrow, and a critical analysis of that poet's work by the late Dr. Nelles. These, with a variety of other topics, make a very attractive number of this popular magazine.——The Treasury of Religious Thought for November contains four sermons and several "Leading Sermonic Thoughts," which may be suggestive to preachers. Its "Critical Comment" has "The Song of Songs" for its subject. Its writer, Professor Milton S. Terry, contends very judiciously that its heroine is a maiden of Palestine betrothed to an absent lover, but tempted by Solomon to become his concubine. The loyalty of her love to her betrothed is the theme of this famous song.——The Converted Catholic, intelligently edited by Father Connor, aims at the conversion of Roman Catholics to Evangelical Christianity. Its September number, among its other portrayals of the anti-Christian character of Romanism, has a paper by Mr. John Bond, entitled, "Why I Left the Roman Catholic Church," in which that gentleman gives his opinion of the evil character of that anti-Christian body, based on his own experiences and observations.——The Homiletic Review for November is, as it usually is, filled with matter which is both suggestive and instructive to ministers.——The Gospel in all Lands for November is rich in important papers. We note "Countries and People of South America" (illustrated), "The Gospel in Russia," "Churches and Missionary Societies." This magazine should be considered as indispensable food for the sustenance of the missionary spirit by every Church.——The Missionary Review of the World for November discusses, "Native Instrumentality in Foreign Missions," "Forerunners of Carey," "Africa in the World's Congress," etc. A valuable number of this standard magazine.——The Critical Review of Theological and Philosophical Literature for October, edited by Professor S. D. F. Salmond, D.D. In this review current publications on theological and philosophical topics are critically analyzed by some of the most distinguished writers of England and Scotland. It is valuable for students of theology who desire to keep themselves informed of the progress of modern thought.

BOOKS: CRITIQUES AND NOTICES.

THE THOUGHT-WORLD.

No department of industry is more active. Like some great mechanism that never stops, the human brain works on and on, filling the earth with the material results of its operation and leaving to succeeding centuries the lasting evidences of its skill. Every wonderful machine in iron or steel, every towering cathedral, every Madonna upon the canvas, is a record of this brain industry in enduring form. But books not least of all are the permanent registration of the thought of the ages. Whether in the department of theology, science, philosophy, or general literature, the printed volume preserves the thought-activity of the departed. So Theodore Parker once declared that the books which help us most are those which make us think the most. "The hardest way of learning," he wrote, "is by easy reading; but a great book that comes from a great thinker—it is a ship of thought, deep freighted with truth and with beauty." Measured by this basis of judgment the books of the day are not surpassed by the old. Still do many volumes which are newly printed excite the logical faculty, stir the emotions, and arouse men to action. As enduring evidences of the activity of the thought-world their value is untold. Among them all we may mention as of particular worth in our notices of the present issue: Apologetics, by A. B. Bruce; The Democracy of Christianity, by L. White; Faith Healing, Christian Science, and Kindred Phenomena, by J. M. Buckley; India and Malaysia, by J. M. Thoburn; and The Armies of To-day.

RELIGION, THEOLOGY, AND BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

Apologetics; or, Christianity Defensively Stated. By ALEXANDER BALMAIN BRUCE, D.D., Professor of Apologetics and New Testament Exegesis, Free Church College, Glasgow; Author of The Training of the Twelve, etc. Crown 8vo, pp. 522. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Price, cloth, $2.50 net.

It would seem that Christianity needs no apology. In the estimate of the great majority of observers its works are its sufficient defense. Wherever in the wide world it has gone it has dispelled darkness, lessened burdens, and transformed human living. Subjected to the most rigid scrutiny as regards the quality of the fruit that it bears, it has triumphantly endured all tests, and dominates the existing religions of the world. Nor is this the only hesitation for the admission of apologetics into the curriculum of theological study. But there is force in other objections that have been made, according to the present author, the ground that apologetics borrows its material from other sciences, and the function of defense is performed by theology itself, and that the proper statement and handling of the particular dogmatic truth which unbelievers attack renders other defense unnecessary by the apologist.

These are weighty objections. Yet we are far from granting that apologetics subserves no purpose in the department of argument and has no place among Christian evidences. As an aid to belief, particularly in the case of those who are inquiring for the truth and are open to its influences, apologetics may help to faith when other evidences have proved insufficient. Believing that it should therefore have a place in the department of theological study, Professor Bruce now sets forth in a new light some of the familiar arguments for the gospel system, aiming "to secure for Christianity a fair hearing with conscious or implicit believers whose faith is stifled or weakened by antichristian prejudices of varied nature and origin." In the threefold division of his volume the author considers, in Book I, the "Theories of the Universe, Christian and Antichristian," giving that ample consideration, not alone to the Christian, but to the Pantheistic, the Materialistic, the Deistic, the Modern Speculative, and the Agnostic theories, which the largeness of the subjects demands. In the very fact that these later philosophies stand in opposition to the Gospel as to fundamental doctrines, like the divine personality, human sin and redemption, providence, and immortality, they can neither be ignored nor belittled. To show them forth in a spirit of candor is therefore the part of the Christian theologian; and in proving their speciousness, rather than in ignoring the vigor of their claims, must Christianity look for its true defenders. With much clearness has Dr. Bruce sketched these various antichristian philosophies. Notwithstanding many excellencies in his work, we must, however, seriously deplore some concessions made by him which seem unnecessary to the argument, and which are in antagonism to ordinary belief. Some of these, for instance, are the surmise that man may be mortal irrespective of his fall; that it may not be contrary to Christian theism to hold that the world has always existed—a view which will certainly lead the reader to "Manichæan dualism or pantheism;" and that the "grand conception" of evolution is the true theory of the creation. The mischievous tendency of these positions must be their refutation. On the basis that Christianity has its "historic presuppositions" the author has devoted Book II to the consideration of "The Historical Preparation for Christianity." Granting that the entire previous history of the world, with its religious movements, was "a divinely ordered preparation for the coming of Christ," there is nothing belonging to this preparatory period which is of little consequence. And particularly is Judaism of moment. Its national beginnings, its Mosaic institutions, its system of prophetic utterance, and its literature are all elements in the consideration that stand forth with prominence in this historic background and demand explicit attention. All these varied features in the story of Israel—including its national inception, its period of prosperity, and its various captivities—come thus under review. But, again, orthodox belief will object to such positions taken by the author as that apologetics should grant concessions to the "evolutionary theory of the origin of Old Testament literature and religion;" or that the correctness of every historical statement in the Hebrew Scriptures is a matter of indifference. Book III is devoted to a study of "The Christian Origins," involving a consideration of Jesus as the Christ and the founder of the kingdom of God, of the personality and work of Paul, primitive Christianity, the synoptical gospels, and the fourth gospel. If a familiar line of review, it is always an important one in the study of Christian evidences. Whether Jesus drew from his favorite prophets his Messianic idea, as the author teaches, is a matter for difference of judgment. Yet in the Christ of history all will find, with Dr. Bruce, the true Messiah and Lord. Concerning the value of Paul to the early Church it is satisfactory that reference is also made. The theory of the Tübingen school that "Christianity would have been a failure but for Paul" is an overputting of the case which Professor Bruce does well to resent, giving the great apostle his rightful place, however, in the acknowledgment of "his very great importance as the interpreter and eloquent preacher of what we believe to be the true mind of Jesus concerning the destination of the Gospel." Christianity, in other words, according to the author's summation, is "the absolute religion. It is, indeed, God's final word to men. On the simple principle of the survival of the fittest it is destined to perpetuity and to ultimate universality." We close the volume regretting that we may not notice except in the most cursory way the many weighty themes with which the book is crowded. Herein, in fact, is a general criticism that may be passed upon the work. The one volume should rather have been three, since three distinct fields of thought are swept in too rapid review. Yet despite this fact, and notwithstanding its vulnerable positions which have in some instances gone unmentioned, it is weighty in thought, logical in arrangement, and clear in expression; and is an arsenal from which the Christian polemic may draw many a weapon for aggressive warfare.

The Book of Job. By ROBERT A. WATSON, D.D., Author of Judges and Ruth, Gospels of Yesterday, etc. Crown 8vo, pp. 416. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The Gospel of St. John. In Two Volumes. Vol. II. By MARCUS DODS, D.D., Professor of Exegetical Theology, New College, Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, pp. 427. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The Epistle to the Ephesians. By the Rev. Professor G. G. FINDLAY, B.A., Headingley College, Leeds. Crown 8vo, pp. 440. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The employment of different authors in the construction of a commentary on the Bible has its certain benefits. Specialists are thereby permitted to interpret the scriptural books for which they have a particular liking, and to which they have given, it may be, long investigation. Undue responsibility for a complete commentary, which few would voluntarily choose, is also obviated; and the stamp of any one individual mind on the completed work is avoided. The preparation of the present series of commentaries is thus of diverse authorship, with the excellencies gained which have been indicated. In the first volume mentioned Dr. Watson undertakes the consideration of one of the most difficult books of the Scripture. Its unknown authorship and the circumstances of its preparation—problems which all interpreters of Job have met—confront him at the outset. On the basis that the earlier portions of Proverbs belong to the post-Solomonic age, he would refer the Book of Job to an even later date. In his estimate it probably belongs to the period immediately following the captivity of the northern tribes, as held by Ewald and others, or to the time of the captivity of Judah, as favored by such critics as Davidson and Cheyne. On the evidences for such a belief, in the altogether speculative nature of the question, it is not necessary to linger. Holding thus to the later date for the authorship of Job, the commentator believes him to have been an exile of the northern kingdom who had widely traveled and had enriched his own tongue by the ideas and words of other countries. As to Job's book, it is autobiographical rather than imaginative. "In some hour of burning memory and revived experience he has caught at the history of one who, yonder in a valley of the eastern wilderness, knew the shocks of time and pain, though his heart was right with God; and in the heat of his spirit the poet-exile makes the story of that life into a drama of the trial of human faith—his own endurance and vindication, his own sorrow and hope." On the author's consideration of the successive scenes in this ancient tragedy it is not possible to dwell. But it is enough to say that he interprets the story of Job with a vividness and a skill which deserve only commendation.

Dr. Marcus Dods, the author of the second volume under notice, has furnished at least three other numbers of the present series of commentaries. It falls to his portion in the present instance to discuss the sublime events in the close of the Saviour's earthly life, as recorded by St. John. Without any particularly noticeable feature in his process he has written a running comment on the impressive events that displays both scholarship and constructive tact. All lovers of the fourth gospel will be interested to possess this work, especially as it is the second of two volumes on the gospel of St. John.

The contrast between the Galatian and the Ephesian epistles is the sentiment with which Professor Findlay begins his present commentary. The first epistle suggests the battlefield; the second, the quiet of the temple. "It is as though a door were suddenly opened in heaven; it shuts behind us, and earthly tumult dies away. The contrast between these two writings, following each other in the established order of the epistles, is singular and in some regard extreme. They are, respectively, the most combative and peaceful, the most impassioned and unimpassioned, the most concrete and abstract, the most human and divine amongst the great apostle's writings." Discovering in the general epistle such topics as Praise and Prayer, Doctrine, and practical teachings on Church Life and Christian Morals, the commentator has followed this line of discussion in his scrutiny of the Ephesian epistle. His work as a whole is no less able than the two others in our present classification.

All of the above volumes belong to "The Expositor's Bible Series," of which A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York, are the publishers. The reader who is already familiar with the series needs not to be told that its numbers are general in their nature rather than textually exegetical, and are to be valued as books of practical reference rather than works of over-erudite scholarship.

Genesis Printed in Colors. Showing the Original Sources from which It is Supposed to Have Been Compiled. With an Introduction. By EDWIN CONE BISSELL. Professor in McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago. 8vo, pp. 59. Hartford: Belknap & Warfield. Price, cloth, $1.25.

The mystery surrounding the authorship of Genesis has as yet proved baffling to Christian scholarship. Whether the book is a compilation from previously existing documents; if so, how many the original sources from which it was gathered; and who the unknown redactor may have been that made the compilation, are questions belonging to the general subject whose solution waits for the future. Their mystery, in short, is a part of the indefiniteness surrounding those far-away, enigmatic, semi-visionary times of Genesis itself. We have no novel theory to advance upon this unknown authorship, in the brief notice of the work now under review; nor does Professor Bissell himself suggest any new explanation of the difficulties that encompass the question. Holding the matter on the contrary in abeyance, as well as the relation of a composite authorship to "the authenticity, authority, and divine inspiration of Genesis," he has rather attempted in his work to present the text of Genesis in a manner best calculated to show the original sources of the sacred book. The scheme of textual analysis is that of Kautzsch and Socin, and is remarkable in its ingenuity. By the use of blue, black, green, lemon, orange, brown, and red inks, documents P, J, J^1, JE, E, and others are indicated; so that the user of the analysis has before him in concrete form the position of the higher critics on the construction of Genesis. As a faithful student of the Pentateuch, Professor Bissell has done the world of exact scholarship a lasting service in the preparation of the present volume. The critical student of the Hebraic text will find it valuable as a book of reference, in these days of discussion as to the authorship of the early books of Scripture.

Illustrative Notes. A Guide to the Study of the Sunday School Lessons for 1893. Including Original and Selected Expositions, Plans of Instruction, Illustrative Anecdotes, Practical Applications, Archæological Notes, Library References, Maps, Pictures, Diagrams. By JESSE L. HURLBUT, D.D., and ROBERT R. DOHERTY, Ph.D. 8vo, pp. 387. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Helps in the study of the International Lessons have long since become an indispensable part of the Sunday school literature of the day. The ordinary commentary will not suffice. For the elementary students of our Sabbath schools a simplified form of lesson comment is necessary; for those who are more advanced, an exposition which has been prepared with the thought of the practical needs of the users; and for all, a separate volume which is portable in its size and exclusive in its purpose. No qualification of this sort, or of others that might be mentioned, seems to be lacking in the case of the Illustrative Notes now under comment. With each recent new year we have been called upon to give a critical estimate of the successive volumes in the series; and of them all we have had occasion to speak only commendatory words. The present volume is, if it may be, superior to its predecessors. But how is it possible to add to words of recommendation already superlative? Nothing seems wanting. In its expositions of the successive lessons, its "Hints to Teachers," "Practical Thoughts," and "Illustrations for the Use of Teachers" the Notes have provided for the most diverse and critical needs. In its letterpress and illustrations the volume is equal to the best Sunday school publications of the day. We have no additions to propose to the subject matter of the Notes. The publication should have the largest sale in its history.

The Thorn in the Flesh; or, A Religious Meditation on Affliction. By J. W. ETTER, D.D. With an Introduction by Bishop JOHN F. HURST, D.D., LL.D. 12mo, pp. 107. Price, 60 cents.

With Paul's "thorn in the flesh"—which he thinks was "some disease of the eyes"—as a point of departure, Dr. Etter writes strongly and thoughtfully of the moral dangers, the remedies, and the benefits of ill health. Though he names his book "a religious meditation," yet its style is rather didactic than meditative, furnishing many suggestive ideas fitted to feed the burdened mind when in its reflective and contemplative moods. In his final chapter the doctor discusses the question of "Divine Healing." After rightly denouncing the so-called "Christian science" as "a stupendous fraud," he gives his reasons for believing that we cannot reject the evidences of latter-day miraculous healing without also rejecting "the evidences of every miracle, ancient and modern." This would be sound reasoning, perhaps, if the "evidences" of miraculous power in each case were proven to be identical, which identity, however, the writer does not attempt to prove. Hence many of his readers will incline to the opinion that he leans too much toward the charlatanry he condemns. With this exception, it is safe to say that this little book is so instructively written, and is so tender and sweet in its spirit, that it can scarcely fail to become as a "ministering angel" to such children of affliction as may have the opportunity to peruse it.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 12mo, pp. 178. Boston: George H. Ellis. Price, cloth, $1.

Only advanced thinkers can appreciate the sentiments of these sermonic addresses. From the usual standpoint they are crowded with statements that shock the faith of the believer. Among their startling announcements we find such propositions as the following: The difference between Christianity and other religions is one of degree rather than of kind; the patriarchs, Abraham and Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, are largely traditional figures; Jesus was born at Nazareth, and not in Bethlehem; he did not teach doctrine, organize a Church, or establish any sacraments; it is not certain whether he believed himself the Messiah or not; the atonement was not necessary; the Jewish race is to be absolved from "that hideous load of imaginary guilt under which they have labored for centuries, of having consciously or purposely, or even ignorantly, put to death the Son of God;" we do not now need a Trinity; the infallible revelation of the supernatural "has gone;" the question as to whether a man shall live again can only be settled by science; there is no fixed condition in the future life; the future religion will be a combination of "the heart of Christ and the clear-headed guidance of the finest knowledge that the world can possibly attain." We might quote at more length from this unusual volume, were more extracts needed to show the advanced position which the author has reached. They well illustrate the lengths to which that liberty would go for whose exercise the demand is so strenuously made.

Christ and the Inheritance of the Saints. Illustrated in a Series of Discourses from the Colossians. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. 12mo, pp. 344. New York: E. B. Treat. Price, cloth, $1.

Out of Harness. Sketches, Narrative and Descriptive. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. 12mo, pp. 388. New York: E. B. Treat. Price, cloth, $1.

Dr. Guthrie was a preacher renowned for eloquence, learning, and spiritual force. His sermons attracted the scholarly and the ignorant, the aristocracy and the common people. The first volume above mentioned is a series of discourses, founded on Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, which exalt Christ and the privileges of the saints in him. Purely scriptural in substance, and agreeing with the general faith, they are good reading for the times. Seeming to be the product of an evangelical mind uninfluenced by environment or the condition of society, and, therefore, without archaisms or local coloring, they are spiritual food to the hungry.

In the second volume the author appears as an essayist or magazine writer, confining himself chiefly to narrative and descriptive sketches. He describes towns, persons, schools, seasons, houses, and inscriptions, with clearness, fullness, and interest. The book is a reflection of histories, tastes, and habits of observation, and is written in an easy style.

Into His Marvelous Light: Studies in Life and Belief. By CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, D.D., Minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. 12mo, pp. 354. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, $1.50.

In this admirably printed volume Dr. Hall has given twenty sermons to the reading public, gracefully dedicated to "the members of my congregation in the fifteenth year of our fellowship in the Gospel of Jesus Christ." These discourses treat of questions which relate to various phases of the ethical and spiritual life. We note as of special interest, "Christ the Pillar of Light;" "The Embrace of God;" "The Gift of Adversity;" "The Mountain Climb of Life;" and "The Retrospect of Trial." Dr. Hall possesses the "art of putting things." He writes strongly and suggestively. His style, mode of treatment, and illustrations are peculiarly his own, and the vein of tenderness running through his thoughts makes them powerful to move the heart of a Christian reader.

PHILOSOPHY, SCIENCE, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

The Democracy of Christianity; or, Equality in the Dealings of God with Men. By Rev. LORENZO WHITE, A.M. 12mo, pp. 307. New York: Printed by Hunt & Eaton. Price, $1.25.

This volume is the work of a strong and radical thinker who has the courage to give full expression to his convictions. It consists of a series of essays which, though formally independent of each other, are yet so connected by an intangible thread as to constitute a logical discussion of the central concept of the kingdom of God. This concept is, as the author states it, that "within the realm of responsibility it secures perfect or absolute freedom to all," and that "it assures all equality of opportunity for deserving and gaining the approval of God, and for achieving success in the probation of life." These two ideas, with their related topics, are discussed in a style which is generally clear and rises at times to epigrammatic force. The author's statement that human freedom is "freedom to elect for one's self between the path of rectitude and life and the sinful indulgence that leads to death," or as "power equally to sin and to abstain from sin," is well and strongly put. But when he affirms that "he whose probation is closed is no longer under the conditions of accountable freedom," and that to be "out of probation is to be out of the sphere of moral agency," one hesitates to accept a speculative proposition which leads him to the author's conclusion that "he whose probation ends in victory no longer faces the alternative choice between the right and wrong." This, if we interpret it correctly, means that once in heaven the man ceases to be the possessor of that liberty of choice which gives moral dignity to his nature while on earth. He then falls under that law of necessity which Mr. White opposes with such righteous indignation when treating of human freedom. It may be difficult to harmonize the certainty of a saved soul's everlasting loyalty to God with his absolute moral freedom; but we prefer to place that difficulty among things which are mysterious to us only because we now know them only in part, rather than to accept a theory which, by denying moral freedom to the redeemed, makes their obedience automatic. Overstatement of the "equality in probation" is also apparent in the author's discussion of this great question. All men, he claims, have now such equal opportunity to secure God's favor that "no one found on the left hand on the great day of awards will be able to say of one on the right hand, 'If I had had his probation I should now take his crown and he would suffer my doom.'" It may not be easy to overthrow the logic which supports this theory. But, remembering that Jesus once solemnly declared that if Tyre, Sidon, and Sodom had been as highly favored with miraculous influences as Capernaum was in his day they would have repented, one is inclined to think that there are such unknown factors in the administration of God as would, if known to men, upset the pillars on which much of the argument for this extreme view of absolute probational equality reposes. Perhaps the key to the apparent inequalities in men's probationary opportunities may be found in such an quality of opportunity and of responsibility as to solve the problem. The author's treatment of Christ's redemptive work, though substantially sound, is yet liable to be understood as understating its expiatory features. This is owing to his evident endeavor to impress the supreme importance of human effort on his readers. His discussion of the doctrine of a second probation is very satisfactory. And viewed as a whole there is so much in this book that is suggestive, stimulative of thought, sound in doctrine, and helpful to earnest seekers of truth that, without indorsing all its points, one may join its devout author in "commending it to the attention of all candid disciples."

The Foundations of Rhetoric. By ADAMS SHERMAN HILL, Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Harvard University. 12mo, pp. 337. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $1.

Three principles are fundamental, according to Professor Hill, in all good writing; these three being the use of no word in any other than its established sense, the placing of every word in the place fixed for it by the idiom of the language, and the use of no more words than are necessary to accomplish the purpose designed. So sensible and commonly accepted are these three basal regulations that there is no reason for their challenge here. For the instruction and help of elementary students Professor Hill has prepared the present treatise. And it is pleasant to observe that in his practical composition he is himself a satisfactory illustration of that perspicuity which makes for rhetorical excellence. Believing also in the value of object lessons, we are gratified that the author has made emphatic, by the abundant use of concrete illustrations, the abstract rules which he teaches. Much that is helpful to beginners and also suggestive to experienced writers is found in his pages. We cannot but commend the book, and believe that its use in our grammar schools and academies will contribute to the attainment of a good style, described by Swift as "proper words in proper places."

The Armies of To-day. A Description of the Armies of the Leading Nations at the Present Time. Illustrated. 8vo, pp. 438. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $3.50.

Warfare has long since become a science. In the earlier days, when the bow and arrow, the javelin, and the sling constituted the ordinary weapons of battle, fighting was desultory and informal. Every warrior was in some sense a guerrilla, hiding behind ambushes or fighting under the cover of the dark. But with the gradual construction of military fortifications, the invention of gunpowder, the discovery of more terrible explosives, and the improvement in tactical practices, warfare has passed from the experimental stage and has attained a degree of scientific precision which the future will hardly surpass. The present volume may therefore in some sense be regarded as a description of approximately ideal conditions in military operations. Eight prominent authorities on the military history and regulations of their respective nations contribute to the work. They are Brigadier-General Wesley Merritt, U.S.A., General Viscount Wolseley, K.P., of Great Britain, Lieutenant-Colonel Exner, of the German army, General Lewal, of the French army, an unnamed Russian general, General Baron Von Kuhn, of the Austro-Hungarian army, G. Goiran, General Staff Colonel of the Italian army, and Thomas A. Janvier, of the Mexican army. Each of these writers, we have reason for inferring, may be considered an authority on the military customs of his nation. By comparison of part with part the diverse convictions and habits of the different nationalities will assume a stronger contrast; by consideration of the whole field of martial practice a growing admiration for the ingenuity of man, even in his purposes to kill his fellow, will be engendered. The Appendix added by Lieutenant-Colonel Exner, on "The Military Situation in Europe," is at once a practical and scientific portrayal of the present conditions in army life, as they exist on the European continent. Despite the grim nature of its subject-matter and a probably growing belief in the great benefits that would follow national arbitration, this volume must rank among the most attractive books of the season. Beautiful in print and superb in illustration, it will doubtless have many purchasers.

Did a Hen or an Egg Exist First? or, My Talks with a Skeptic. By JACOB HORNER. Edited by JAMES CROMPTON. 12mo, pp. 96. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

Under the peculiar and seemingly humorous title which this book bears various serious talks are published upon fundamental questions in science and religion. The conversations are familiar in their character, and are supposed to be carried on between the writer and his nephew, Tom Rod. In their aim they maintain the important principles of Christian faith, such as the creation and providence of God, human resurrection and immortality. While candid in its notice of the advanced scientific positions on these great questions, the dialogue is none the less earnest in its maintenance of the interests of revealed religion. It was originally designed as a "cheap and readable" book for English workingmen, and in its American edition should also interest similar thinkers on this side of the Atlantic.

Faith Healing, Christian Science, and Kindred Phenomena. By J. M. BUCKLEY, LL.D. 12mo, pp. 303. New York: The Century Co. Price, fancy cloth, $1.25.

The present volume is particularly fortunate in the subjects it discusses. While the study of the occult has always a charm for the reader, this is particularly the case when mental operations and the vital relations of mentality to the external world are involved. No list of topics involving the mysterious, and sometimes bordering on the supernatural, could be drawn up more fascinating than such matters as "Faith Healing," coincidences, dreams, somnambulism, presentiments, visions, apparitions, witchcraft, "Christian Science," and "Mind Cure." Into this large arena of discussion the author enters as one who has long made the study of psychical processes a specialty and knows with confidence whereof he writes. It is only in harmony with the facts to say that he has considered the intricate questions involved in a truly scientific spirit. Calm, philosophical, and searching in his attitude, no antagonist can charge charlatanism upon his methods. But it also agrees with the facts to say that Dr. Buckley has avoided, by the abundant use of illustrations, the undue wearisomeness that often attaches to a scientific discussion. Fortunate as he is in having a world-wide field from which to draw concrete instances that are pertinent to the discussion, he has so availed himself of this opportunity that his book is charmful upon every page. No more truly scientific or interesting volume has lately appeared discussing the mysterious and phenomenal in mental operation.

Selections from the Poetical Works of Robert Browning. Vignette Edition. With One Hundred New Illustrations by THOMAS MCILVAINE. 12mo, pp. 474. Prose, fancy cloth, $1.50.

Aurora Leigh, and Other Poems. By ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. Vignette Edition. With Numerous Illustrations by FREDERICK C. GORDON. 12mo, pp. 415. Price, fancy cloth, $1.50.

The poems of the Brownings need no specification or elucidation here. In the present instance it is the nature of the edition published that calls for particular notice. By a happy fortune the two poets, who were so joined in their work and lives, are now favored with similar issues of some of their choice compositions. In this fact sentiment will find a coincidence and a pleasure. And it is certain that no poet could wish for a more tasty edition of his works than those now considered. Beautiful alike in their ornamental covers, mechanical preparation, and illustrations, the companion volumes are among the most attractive poetical works of the holiday season. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, of New York, are the publishers.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND TOPOGRAPHY.

India and Malaysia. By Bishop J. M. THOBURN, Thirty-three Years a Missionary in India. 8vo, pp. 562. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, $2.

The devout student who would recognize God in history; the preacher who would stimulate his hearers by reports of what is really doing in the progress of Christ's kingdom; the pastor who would lead his flock into invigorating pastures, cannot consent to ignore this unpretentious yet powerful history of what its far-seeing writer believes to be "the mightiest movement of the globe." Nor can we believe that the reader who may come to this book in a receptive frame of mind can finish it without having reached an opinion very much in harmony with the author's outspoken conviction. A singleness of aim, united with a complete knowledge of his topic, results in making a most readable book, though it is a volume of nearly six hundred pages, with a title uninteresting to the majority. In the first ten of the more than forty chapters Bishop Thoburn rapidly discusses the topographical, ethnological, political, and religious features of India, and in each aspect gives the broadest view in the most condensed style. The English occupation of India is regarded from the providential standpoint, and in the opening paragraphs of chapter iv this is most clearly outlined. A more popular setting forth of the philological treasures of that wonderful land than he gives in chapter ii we are unable to recall, where the eleven leading nations of the empire are enumerated, seven of Aryan and four of Dravidian stock. The principal religions of the empire are delineated with a fair-mindedness which must impress the reader most pleasantly. The thought is with the reader as he enjoys these chapters that were Hindoos or Mohammedans, Buddhists or devotees his hearers, the bishop's impartiality of statement and hearty appreciativeness of what is good in these "broken lights" would compel their dispassionate attention. From chapters xi to xv the reader is given a complete, if condensed, history of early efforts to introduce Christianity into India. The first of these chapters effectually does away with the often-met assumption of Roman Catholic successes. Francis Xavier's history is given sympathetically, yet it is only when the writer, with fervid pen, describes the toils and triumphs of that great apostle of modern missions, William Carey, that we really catch the spirit which thrills him and must stir any but the most stolid of readers. With chapter xvi begins the third part of the book, dealing with the missions of our own communion from their earliest beginning, through their providential growth, to the immense proportions of to-day, which only suggest the vastness of what is yet to be. In the course of this history that essential equipment of the historian, the fair-mindedness which is a marked characteristic of Bishop Thoburn, again impresses us. With him history is history; and whether his may have been the winning or the losing side matters little to this clear-eyed watcher of God's purposes as he unfolds the history of the taking of the mighty land of India for Christ. As an excellent illustration of what we mean we may refer to chapter xxii, where he writes the story of the much-discussed policy of "self-support." The three chapters on "Women of India," "Education Among Women," and "Medical Work for Women" were written by Miss Thoburn and reflect the same spirit of breadth and impartiality which by this time may well be called Thoburnesque!

We venture the opinion that the heart of this book is to be found in the pages from chapters xxxi to xxxv, which might all have for their general title "Open Doors." As giving the true spirit of the book we may extract from the closing paragraph of chapter xxxv: "In the preceding five chapters I have, in addition to brief notices of other fields, sketched in bare outline thirteen vast regions, each capable of furnishing material enough to make a Christian empire, into which we have been led in the providence of God, and are fully committed to do our share of evangelization. . . . I regard it as practically certain that within a very few years we could report an average of from five to ten thousand converts for each one these fields every year. . . . We are compelled to go forward. Never did the providence of God, working in harmony with the revealed word, and with the clear and widely-felt promptings of the Holy Spirit, call more clearly or in louder tones to any people to engage in any specific line of Christian duty." Two chapters besides treat on life in India and on Indian music, which latter is a monograph upon an interesting topic too little known or studied. Three chapters more set forth the claims of Malaysia, as Bishop Thoburn calls that part of the East Indian Archipelago occupied by the Malay races; and here is told the story, reading like one long romance, of our work in Singapore. We know of no better vindication of the superiority in foreign mission work of that form of church government which includes episcopal supervision than this book, so imperial in its scope and apostolic in its spirit. A second edition might well provide maps, without which the book cannot be the most intelligently read. Its twenty-seven illustrations are superior in execution, and, having been made expressly for the work, really illustrate the letter-press. The well-known name of its author, who always commands a hearing on both sides of the world, will contribute much to the general introduction of the volume.

Three Episodes of Massachusetts History: The Settlement of Boston Bay; The Antinomian Controversy; A Study of Church and Town Government. By CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS. Two volumes. Crown 8vo, pp. 1067. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, for the two volumes, $4.

While, as Mr. Adams observes, "in a narrow sense this book is a history of the town of Quincy, in Massachusetts," it is so related to general history that, in reality, it is what its title purports. The story of repeated attempts at an established settlement in Boston Bay, by Weston, Morton, and especially Gorges, is told with considerable detail—though these attempts were of little significance, except as Gorges's charter, giving him and those associated with him all the territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific, between the fortieth and forty-eighth degrees of latitude, or practically all the Northern States of our Union, enabled him to make trouble in later years. The coming of Endicott to Salem, and Winthrop to Boston, as governor under the charter of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, made the settlement a permanency. The next sixteen years, whose history Mr. Adams follows, were years of trouble, and included the struggle for the revocation of the charter. This struggle would, beyond question, have been successful had not Charles I, Laud, and Wentworth found themselves so occupied that they had no leisure for attention to a plantation across the sea. Indeed, there was a time when the danger was great; when Winthrop was ordered to send the charter to England, but diplomatically delayed; when a governor-general under the Gorges grant was designated; and when it seemed that there would be a New England without the Puritans. But in the colony the people were of one mind. Partisans of Gorges, like Morton and Ratcliff, were as brutally treated as the Star-chamber treated its victims, and were banished. "What ought we to do if a general governor should be sent out of England?" asked the governor and the assistants of the assembled ministers of the colony. With one voice they replied, "We ought not to accept him, but defend our lawful possessions if we are able." This episode is vividly described by the author. The second episode of Massachusetts history took in the inner life of the colony, when, in addition to its struggle for existence against the machinations of Gorges, it was for two years in turmoil over the so-called Antinomian controversy. Anne Hutchinson was evidently in perfect innocency at the bottom of it. Coming from England in 1634, only four years after Winthrop, she found the women of the Church in the habit of meeting on a week day and talking over the discourses of the preceding Sabbath. In time they met at her house. She was not versed in theology, but had read her Bible to some purpose, and, more than that, she had drunk of its spirit. Thinking that some of the ministers preached more as the apostles did before the Pentecost than after, she affirmed that they proclaimed a covenant of works instead of grace. Though none of her utterances would create a ripple in the Boston of to-day, yet she was deemed to have spoken disparagingly of ministers! The government, being a Church State, in which harmony of religious belief must prevail, and of that belief the ministers being judges, the upshot was Mrs. Hutchinson's excommunication by the Church, her banishment by the State, and the self-exile of the best people of the colony. The story as told by Mr. Adams is one of the romantic episodes of early New England history. The transition to the building of a church and a town is easy. Accordingly, Mr. Adams next narrates the history of Braintree, of which Quincy was a part, as a typical one. It is the story for two hundred and fifty years, not only of a town, but of a people legislating on the gravest questions, and in their own way carving out their own destinies. The town is the Massachusetts unit. Its work as described in these pages, as also all the history which is outlined, is well worth the study of the political philosopher.

Moltke: His Life and Character. Sketched in Journals, Letters, Memoirs, a Novel, and Autobiographical Notes. With Illustrations from Drawings by Moltke, Portraits, and Fac-simile Letters. Translated by MARY HERMS. 8vo, pp. 332. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $3.

If there be any value in the study of biography, the scrutiny of such a character as that of the great field-marshal of Germany will yield most satisfactory results. Blessed with a life of ninety-one years, he had been a leader in the martial affairs of continental Europe during the memory of more than two generations. Held also in high esteem upon the American shores, as on the European continent, the publication of his life story, now that he has departed, can only be confirmatory of the convictions as to his greatness which have before prevailed. We should value this biography. Judged by many standards of measurement Von Moltke was one of the first warriors of the century. In his student preparation he gave promise of more than usual success; in his later leadership he consecrated to Germany that intellectual vigor, that skill in strategy, and that bravery in battle whose record is gathered in the present volume from various authentic sources. But Von Moltke was more than a warrior. Over the romance of his love and marriage the reader lingers with tender sentiment. Into the retirement of his old age we follow him with reverent inquiry as to the right use of the closing days of life. Though attaining to extreme age, as already remarked, he never grew superannuated in thought. Simple in his habits of life, industrious in practice, optimistic in spirit, and a Christian in his religious belief, he has left a noble example, not only for German admirers, but for the world. The omission of the portrait, as known in elder life, is the one seeming blemish in an otherwise exceptional biography. Although appearing in another number of the series, yet it seems to be needed here. It is pleasant to read in the volume the commendation of William I to Von Moltke that his name "will be recorded in the history of all times." Because he was truly a great man, not only in deeds, but much more in character, he belongs to all continents and centuries.

The Bishop's Conversion. By ELLEN BLACKMAR MAXWELL. Introduction by JAMES M. THOBURN. 12mo, pp. 384. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.50.

This is a story of missionary life in India, written by an Indian missionary. There has long been need of such a book. For several years past it has been the fashion for tourists, official and unofficial, after three months' travel in India, to enlighten the American public from the platform, the pulpit, and through the press as to everything in that vast country, including the methods of mission work, the success or failure of missions, the home-life of the missionaries, and the character of the native Christians. The result has been to create in some quarters the impression that the cause of missions was not making much headway, that the converts were but little better than the heathen, and that the missionaries were leading lives of luxurious ease. It was high time that these impressions should be corrected, and this book does so most effectually. Under the guise of a story—in which there is, of course, a love episode—the sorrows and joys, the risks and felicities, the failures and successes of missionary life are delineated with great vividness and power. To those who are at all familiar with the gifted author's life the book possesses a peculiar pathos. She has paid a great price to be able to write as she does; and she is entitled to speak with authority. It is well that the defense of Indian missions should come from a woman. The women of India have suffered most grievous degradation from both Hindoos and Mohammedans. The Christian women who go down into their lives to lift them up must sacrifice themselves correspondingly. They touch the inner circle of the Inferno called heathenism. And much of the work which they do for their dusky sisters is so completely shut in by the walls of the zenana that the general public finds difficulty in understanding its extent and its utility. This book contains the most vivid, and, in some respects, the most valuable description of some of the phases and difficulties of that work which has appeared in print. The only criticism which one would venture to make upon the picture here painted is that the trials and infelicities of missionary life have been collected from a wide field and from the experiences of many missionaries, and are concentrated in the city of Lucknow and brought within a single year. The result is that the brighter colors in the lives of the missionaries are obscured. There is a bright side to mission life and work. This book should be read by every minister before he takes his missionary collection. It should be perused by every one who has thought lightly of the sacrifice made by those who go to the foreign field. It ought to be weighed by every Methodist who has doubted as to the correctness of the policy of the Church in carrying on missions among the heathen. It will especially enlighten those who have been inclined to complain of the slow growth of self-support, and should be an inspiration to heartier sympathy with and support of the cause of foreign missions.

Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, Browning. Illustrated. By ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. 8vo, pp. 190. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, fancy cloth, $2.

For those who are not in personal relations with the great authors of the world the reminiscences of friends are always valuable, as well as the special records that are gathered concerning the characteristics of such noted writers and their methods of work. Of this character is the present volume. The author writes as one who has been in touch with Tennyson, though the poet has passed to the spirit world since this composition. From personal and pleasant associations with Ruskin and the Brownings, also, the writer describes some of their graces of life and habits of work. We must be grateful to Mrs. Ritchie for thus lifting the curtain which hides the private lives of these prominent leaders in modern literature. For what she has said, no less than for the charming manner in which the publishers have issued her volume, the reader will feel his indebtedness.

Henry Martyn, Saint and Scholar, First Modern Missionary to the Mohammedans, 1781–1812. With Portrait and Illustrations. By GEORGE SMITH, C.I.E., LL.D., Author of Life of William Carey, etc. 8vo, pp. 580. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Price, cloth, $3.

The subject of this memoir was no ordinary missionary worker. In turning the pages of the volume the reader feels much of the reverence that moves him when standing in the very presence of a great leader in Christian work. Not only was Henry Martyn the first in chronological order of those who have gone out to teach the Mohammedans of India the way of life, but in all that constitutes missionary self-denial and heroism he has set the example for those who have since carried the Gospel to that heathen land. The extreme conscientiousness of Martyn, with his entire dedication to his chosen work, is a feature of the present biographical review which Dr. Smith makes very clear to the reader. Like a maxim that could only have been born of introspection and wrestling prayer was the watchword with which the great missionary entered India, "Now let me burn out for God." Greater zeal for missionary labor on the part of the lukewarm should be the result of contemplating such passionate enthusiasm as this. For the first time the story of Lydia Grenfell, and the unrealized love between herself and Martyn, is fully told. One cannot but feel in the reading of the sad story that their union would have repressed some of the morbid and almost ascetic tendencies of Martyn, would have lengthened his days, and would have increased his usefulness. That he could have effected so much and have died so young is one of the permanent lessons of the present biographical notice. Since Sargent's Memoir of Martyn, in 1819, and Wilberforce's publication of Martyn's Journals and Letters, in 1837, an adequate life of the great missionary has not appeared until the present volume. It is a most worthy book, and in its fullness of information deserves a place in all Christian libraries.

The Duchess of Berry and the Court of Louis XVIII. With Portrait. By IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND. Translated by ELIZABETH GILBERT MARTIN. 12mo, pp. 301. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Whoever feels that the life of royalty is free from the ills and sorrows which beset ordinary life will have the illusion dispelled in the reading of this historic volume. Shade and sunshine alternated with one another in the life of the Duchess of Berry. A Neapolitan by birth, she became a French woman by adoption and wedded the Duke of Berry at the early age of seventeen. Her married life began under auspices most favorable. The genuine welcome which she received from the royal family of France, and the sincere love of her estimable husband during their brief wedded life, were the bright features in her experience. The loss of her infant children and the cruel assassination of the Duke, leaving her in widowhood at the early age of twenty-one, are the somber colors in the royal picture. But the book is not only a narrative of the tragedy that filled a woman's life. From her relation to the public affairs of France one will naturally expect in this memoir glimpses as well of the political agitations of her day and of many of the doings of the court of Louis XVIII. So far as the limits of the volume allow, these views of public life are also given and cannot but add to the information of the student of history.

The Youth of Frederick the Great. By ERNEST LAVISSE, Professor at the Sorbonne, Paris. Translated from the French by MARY BUSHNELL COLEMAN. 12mo, pp. 445. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Company. Price, cloth, $2.

The childhood experiences of great men constitute some of the most interesting as well as the most important chapters of modern history. In the case of Frederick the Great the tragic incidents of his youth and early manhood lose nothing by their frequent repetition. Miss Coleman has now translated from the French of Professor Lavisse the familiar story of the younger days of the great king. The boorishness and tyranny of Frederick William, the love of Wilhelmina and her brother, the efforts of the younger Frederick to escape from his irascible father, his imprisonment, and the execution of Katte, all receive their adequate notice in the volume. Though narrating only the youthful career of the great Frederick prior to his assumption of the throne, and seeming to close abruptly, yet this is all that in the outset the book proposes. Without particular feature in translation, the author reopens an important chapter in Prussian history.

MISCELLANEOUS.

On Wheels: and How I Came There. A Real Story for Real Boys and Girls. Giving the Personal Experiences and Observations of a Fifteen-Year-Old Yankee Boy as Soldier and Prisoner in the American Civil War. By Private W. B. SMITH, of Company K, 14th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Edited by Rev. JOSEPH GATCH BONNELL, of the St. John's River Conference, Florida. 12mo, pp. 338. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.

The title of this book is its sufficient explanation. The story is one of march and bivouac, skirmish and battle, freedom and imprisonment, hope and sadness. It might be the story of many of the volunteers who marched out to war in the late rebellion. It is the record of a hero who bears the life-long marks of his patriotic service in the physical disability that has come to him as the result of his army life. The generation which have become readers of our war literature since the great struggle finished will find much profit in these thrilling reminiscences.

Quest and Vision. Essays in Life and Literature. By W. J. DAWSON, Author of The Church of To-morrow. 12mo, pp. 233. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, 90 cents.

This is a valuable series of papers in their vigor of thought and grace of diction. The author has written on Shelley, Wordsworth, Longfellow, George Eliot, and George Meredith, besides essays on "Religious Doubt and Modern Poetry" and "The Poetry of Despair." The latter paper has more particular reference to the work of Matthew Arnold and James Thomson. All that Mr. Dawson writes is popular on this side of the Atlantic. In the present case his essays are alike stimulative to thought and provocative of relish for the higher literature.

Practical Hints on Junior League Work. By WILBERT P. FERGUSON, B.D., of the New York East Conference. With an Introduction by Rev. J. F. BERRY, D.D., Editor of the Epworth Herald. 16mo, pp. 103. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, 30 cents.

With the Epworth League have come the origin and development of the Junior League department. Such a result is not strange. No radical movement for the help of the young people of the Methodist Episcopal Church could arise that would not indirectly include the children of our communion. It would seem that the Junior Leagues are calculated to take the place of the "children's class" so long known in Methodism. Yet, if so, it is one of the unavoidable evolutions of the day. Such literature as the present handbook certainly has its value. The author has seemingly given much attention to the Junior League work. His book is filled with "hints" that seem most "practical" on the organization and conduct of such children's associations. It should have a general use.

Sharp Eyes. A Rambler's Calendar of Fifty-two Weeks Among Insects, Birds, and Flowers. By WILLIAM HAMILTON GIBSON, Author of Strolls by Starlight and Sunshine, etc. Illustrated by the Author. 8vo, pp. 322. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, ornamental, gilt tops, $5.

The introduction to this unusual volume has been entitled by Mr. Gibson "Through My Spectacles." Sharp, indeed, has been the vision with which he has explored the different departments of natural history and brought to light the mysteries of the insect, bird, and plant creation. With such a practiced guide as he, the most careless and indifferent could not "walk the woods and fields" and find nature a sealed book. Corresponding to the four periods of the year, the author has entitled his general divisions "Spring," "Summer," "Autumn," and "Winter," and therein considers many of the wonders of nature belonging to these separate seasons. The book is altogether unusual. Not only is its subject matter valuable, because of the high reputation of its author, but also in its print and illustration it is exquisite beyond description. Harper & Brothers have fairly outdone themselves in the issue of so superlative a work.

This book is written by one of our best-known authors, and in a style to charm the ears of childhood listeners.

In His Own Way. By CARLISLE B. HOLDING, Author of Her Ben, etc. 12mo, pp. 196. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

That Boy Mick. By ANNIE FRANCES PERRAM, Author of Go Work, etc. 12mo, pp. 193. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

Thrilling Scenes in the Persian Kingdom. The Story of a Scribe. By EDWIN MACMINN. 12mo, pp. 323. Price, cloth, $1.10.

A Knight That Smote the Dragon; or, The Young People's Gough. By EDWARD A. RAND, Author of Deeds Worth Telling, etc. 12mo, pp. 189. Price, cloth, 90 cents.

The above are safe and profitable books for younger readers. The third is a chapter in important history, clothed in interesting form. The fourth is a sketch of John B. Gough which is most readable. All the volumes are among the later publications of Hunt & Eaton, New York, and Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati.

Select Notes. A Commentary on the International Lessons for 1893. Explanatory, Illustrative, Doctrinal, and Practical; with Illustrations, Maps, Pictures, Chronology of the Old Testament, Chronology of the Acts, Suggestions to Teachers, Library References. By Rev. F. N. PELOUBET, D.D., and M. A. PELOUBET. 8vo, 340. Boston: W. A. Wilde & Co. Price, cloth, $1.25.

In spite of strictures the International Lessons for Sunday schools still maintain their place in the preference of the Christian world. Among the many "helps" to the understanding of these lessons a wide and deserving recognition has been given to the Select Notes of Dr. Peloubet. The volume for 1893 is now issued and fully maintains the standard of previous issues. In the excellence of its maps, illustrations, and practical helps to teaching it is superior.

The Bunny Stories. For Young People. By JOHN HOWARD JEWETT. With Seventy-eight Illustrations by CULMER BARNES. 8vo, pp. 210. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, cloth, $1.75.

Among the readable stories for the little folks this book deserves mention for its narrative and its illustrations.

Blasts from a Ram's Horn. Also an Account of the Author's Conversion. By Rev. ELIJAH P. BROWN, Editor of The Ram's Horn. With an Introduction by Rev. H. A. BUCHTEL, D.D. 12mo, pp. 388. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, $1.20.

Unusual in style and clear in its discernment of human peculiarities, this vigorous criticism of men and of Christians is not always astray from the truth. All who are acquainted with the trenchant method of the author will recognize the practical value of much that he has here written.

Wordsworth's Grave, and other Poems. By WILLIAM WATSON. 16mo, pp. 94. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, fancy cloth, $1.

The Wit and Wisdom of Charles Lamb. With Anecdotes by His Contemporaries. Selected and Arranged by ERNEST DRESSEL NORTH. 16mo, pp. 261. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, fancy cloth, $1.

Children: Their Models and Critics. By AURETTA ROYS ALDRICH. 16mo, pp. 158. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, fancy cloth, 75 cents.

Some of the above handbooks are in prose form, some are poetical. All belong to the higher order of general literature. Each of them may be read with profit in a leisure hour.

The Berean Senior Lesson Book on the International Lessons for 1893. 16mo, pp. 202. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, boards, 15 cents.

The Berean Intermediate Lesson Book on the International Lessons for 1893. 16mo, pp. 188. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, boards, 15 cents.

The Berean Beginner's Lesson Book on the International Lessons for 1893. 16mo, pp. 198. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, boards, 15 cents.

These are the familiar and popular lesson helps for the younger scholars of the Sunday Schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They have been prepared with much care, and are replete with all necessary instruction on the several lessons. None are superior, and none should be given the preference by the schools of our denomination.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

By JOHN MILEY, D.D., LL.D.

Note this interesting array of

PRESS CRITIQUES.

Illustrated Christian Weekly.

"We have been impressed with the ability and fairness with which the subjects discussed in this volume have been handled. It was a great, but not unexpected pleasure to find that Dr. Miley was sound in the faith upon the doctrines 'in the air' at the present time—inerrant inspiration, the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, miracles, prophecy, the incarnation and atonement of Jesus Christ, and the kindred topics."

Public Opinion.

"The author shows that he has thought long and patiently upon all the relations of his subject, and has read widely in all directions. The excellences of the work are many and varied. It will assist many a reader to a clearer discrimination in theological thinking."

New York Observer.

"The author has produced a work of great value. It is written in a lucid and vigorous style, in an excellent spirit, and with a thorough acquaintance with the literature of the subject."

California Christian Advocate.

"The entire work is clearly thought out and plainly stated. We consider the work a very decided acquisition to theological science, and commend it to the attention of all students of the Bible."

Nashville Christian Advocate.

"We unhesitatingly indorse the volume as one of great value, a capital addition to the library of any preacher or any thoughtful layman."

Christian Guardian (Canada).

"The distinguishing feature of this volume which gives it a special value above our standard Methodist theological works is that it discusses all the great questions of Christian theology from a modern standpoint, and with the fullest knowledge of the theories and objections that are current at the present time."

Central Christian Advocate.

"Dr. Miley's Systematic Theology bids fair to occupy a position in literature second to none of the great productions which have enriched the educational forces of the Christian Church."

New York Christian Advocate.

"Exact expression is a familiar trait in Dr. Miley's style. Whatever is lost in fervor and flexibility is more than made up by the admirable clearness of method and statement. We may not agree with Dr. Miley, but it is not easy to misunderstand him. To this must be added another, the laudable habit of bringing out his authorities and giving them a fair introduction to his readers."

Lutheran Quarterly.

"Of the volumes of the Biblical and Theological Library, Dr. Miley was chosen to write on 'Systematic Theology.' The first volume justifies the wisdom of his selection, and raises the expectation that the author will at once be ranked with the leading theologians of the country."

Western Christian Advocate.

"The spirit of candor and fairness that obtains throughout prepossesses one in favor of the author. We commend the book to our readers, and especially to the younger ministers in our Church, who are seeking to shape their beliefs into a system that shall be rational, consistent, and scriptural."

METHODIST REVIEW.

MARCH, 1893.

ART. I.—AMOS SHINKLE.

THE subject of this sketch was born August 11, 1818, on White Oak Creek, Brown County, O., and died in Covington, Ky., November 13, 1892. These dates represent the beginning and end of an extraordinary life, worthy of study and permanent record. He was the son of parents who came as children from Pennsylvania in 1797 to what was then known as the Northwest Territory. His boyhood was passed amid plain and unimpressive scenery, located between the settled East and the undeveloped West; and, as the sunrise of marvelous material prosperity kindled all the land with its glow and called to quickened labor, he challenged the brightness and claimed a part of it as his heritage. He availed himself of such educational advantages as those days afforded, and after completing the curriculum was counted quite competent to teach the school in which his early training had been secured. But ambition turned toward active pursuits rather than studious meditation. At seventeen years of age he kept his father's books, and soon afterward engaged in the lumber business in eastern Kentucky, cutting trees and making the timber into furniture and carrying it for sale on rafts down the river as far as New Orleans. Money acquired in these ventures was invested in the grocery trade, which ended in failure because of too great confidence in the credit system then in general use. The liabilities thus incurred were discharged as soon as possible to the last dollar, although under the law, since he was only twenty years of age, he could not have been held for their payment. Thus early did integrity become the corner stone of the edifice of his prosperity. He builded wisely at the outset, and the years brought symmetry and strength to the structure.

While living in Higginsport, from 1838 to 1845, he took an active interest in the military matters of the State, and was commissioned by Governor Shannon as first lieutenant of artillery in the eighth division of the Ohio militia. He offered himself and company for service at the front in the Mexican War, but, going to Cincinnati to be mustered in, was disappointed in his patriotic purpose, as no more volunteers were needed. November 10, 1842, he was married to Miss Sarah Jane Hughes, and in 1846 his only child, Bradford, was born. In August of the same year he settled in Covington, Ky., with a hard-earned capital of fifteen hundred dollars, considerable experience in business, and a keen desire to achieve fortune in this new and broader area.

His training in the Ohio militia served him happily when afterward, as Colonel of the Kentucky Home Guards, he was commandant of Covington during the Kirby Smith raid; and the lessons he had learned in the little store, in the forests of the Big Sandy, and in trade along the Ohio and Mississippi were to be utilized in vigorous and enlarged commercial competitions. His removal to Covington opened his real business career, distinguished to the last for farsighted wisdom and stainless integrity. He engaged at once in the coal trade on the river from Cincinnati to New Orleans, gaining each year large returns, until he retired from it in 1864, already a capitalist. The Covington and Cincinnati Bridge was conceived by him in 1856, and in manifold discouragements he never lost faith in its final success until its completion ten years later. He was president of the bridge and gas companies, was the founder and president of the First National Bank, and was associated, either as director or president, with other corporations too numerous to mention. He was for a long time prominent in Odd Fellow and Masonic circles, was interested in local politics, was a member of the school board and, for a time, president of the city council. A man must think of something outside of himself or stagnate; hence Mr. Shinkle's public-spirited endeavor that Covington should be no mean city was a strong and constant impulse, efficient in outward result and also in the enrichment of his own character. His connection with the school board inaugurated a change in the architecture of the school buildings, an improvement tending to beauty and utility. Many of the financial enterprises which eventually contributed to his own fortune were conceived in a large-minded desire to benefit the city of his adoption. Few men have ever more thoroughly commanded public confidence. His name was a bond, and his fellow-citizens gave no thought when his vigorous vigilance was in control of their interests and institutions. On every hand can be seen substantial proofs of his disinterested, sagacious activity, in the betterment of the social and material condition of the community in which he lived.

In certain periods there has been a restricted recognition of capacity. Society has turned to a few departments for its ideals of eminence. The man on horseback, sword in hand, marching to conquest, has won and worn the laurel. The orator, thinker, philosopher, statesman has been in turn counted as eminent, while others equally worthy have been overlooked. The notable development of this country in recent years has introduced another class of men, conspicuous in their ability and work, as candidates for favor and fame. The new continent, which our fathers settled, offered an opportunity in its virgin soil and undeveloped resources for the exercise of brain and brawn such as the fields of chivalry never suggested. Amos Shinkle, in the secular aspect of his character, was a business man; he was not a scholar or a statesman, but a man of affairs, judicial in his mental quality, studying events in their germs, working for years among present, practical forces until his mastery over them was complete and the acknowledgment of his power was unquestioned. He had to make his own way; no strong friendship threw over him its shield of protection, no ancestral fortress invited him to its security. He fought for and won his footing. When the difficulties inhering in the problem of life are considered, limited success—even the earning of an honest livelihood and the maintenance of an average position—entitles to praise; but when the barrier of hostile fate is overcome by far-reaching skill the achievement becomes extraordinary. Amos Shinkle has passed away, and the wide vacancy made by his loss is a witness to the manly merit by which he won private fortune and public station. He could boast no titled name, but he belonged to that aristocracy of service which has helped to lay in this country the munificent material groundwork on which the structure of our Christian civilization is to be reared. Somehow, by a sort of intuition, he saw the golden side of opportunities, and with eager wisdom availed himself of the sight. His success was not an accident; it had its reason in his ability and his diligent application to the duties of each hour.

A crisis was approaching in the life of Mr. Shinkle which was destined to revolutionize his standards of thought and action, and to make him essentially a new and different man. The air was full of the shrill alarms of civil war, when hostile theories of government were to meet in battle. Covington was on the border, and a dominant section of the community believed in the doctrine of State rights whose consequences would be a broken and bankrupt nationality. He shrank from the thought of social chaos with instant and absolute aversion, and at the outbreak of the rebellion, when Kentucky was trembling in the balance and multitudes were halting as to which side to take, he promptly called for volunteers, raising for the defense of the city "The Shotgun Company," which speedily grew into a regiment. This challenge to wavering minds defined at once the position of many, and a rallying center was provided for the vacillating Union sentiment.

All this while he was an occasional visitor at public worship and was a pew-holder in one of the prominent churches of the city; but this came from a sense of the outward proprieties of good citizenship and a conformity to decorum, rather than from inward conviction. The churches shared and expressed the prevailing feeling as to the great question which engrossed public attention, and he was not satisfied with their attitude. There was, however, to this an exception; the Methodist Episcopal church located on Greenup Street, unpretending in appearance and limited in resources, represented unhesitating loyalty to the nation, and to this church Mr. Shinkle was drawn by patriotic considerations, and also by the attraction of some strong personal friendships among its members. He threw himself at once into the new work without reluctance or compromise. The plain building soon gave way to a new and stately edifice, taking the name of the Union Meth-

... Episcopal Church, and, that there might be no ques-... as to the flag which the congregation honored, the win-... and woodwork were painted in red, white, and blue. ... association with this society had sprung from motives more ... than usually deep and controlling, and soon the voice of the ... personal Christ was heard by him calling for allegiance, and ... he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. In its initial ... stage his connection with the Church was a business adjustment, ... recognition of an obligation exact and definite in its form ... of statement. Clearer insight transformed this into a positive ... spiritual relationship. He established, contrary to his first in-... tention, a family altar, and, as the prayer of faith was offered at ... the time of the evening sacrifice, God, for Christ's sake, spake ... peace to his heart, and then his Christian life had its birth—... a life destined to grow and ripen into a rich experience.

The Sunday school invited him, almost as soon as he entered ... the Church, to become its superintendent, and he continued in ... its active charge until his death. This work was a blessing to ... him; it gave grace, charm, and a tender tone to his religious ... experience such as nothing else could afford. He was an ideal ... superintendent. Business capacity and spiritual fervor were ... united in his qualifications for this delicate trust. His executive ... skill and thoroughness in detail were of incalculable advantage. ... Nothing escaped him; everything was under his eye. No great ... manufacturing establishment could have been organized and ... operated with a clearer perception of means to ends than the ... Union Sunday school; and when to this accuracy of operation ... was added his distinctive religious purpose, the results in the ... shaping of youthful character cannot be overestimated. For ... one third of his life he stood in this official relation, watching ... the development of hundreds of young people whom Provi-... dence had intrusted to his tender care. The superintendent ... loved and was beloved. The contact between him and the ... school was always close and cordial. One Sabbath, at the close ... of the morning sermon, a little ten-year-old girl out of a new ... and sincere impulse asked the pastor, "Am I too young to ... come to Christ?" The superintendent, standing by his side, ... took the answer from the pastor's lips, saying, "No, my child, ... you may come now. I was too old when I came to him, and I ... have to make up lost time."

By force of circumstances, his natural ability, and social position he became the leading man of his church. Farsighted in his own views of policy, he was considerate of the opinions of others; a strong-willed man, intense and masterful in his personal judgments, he allowed people to differ with him, even radically, and there came in consequence no sense of coldness or separation. He recognized that society, to endure in peace, must be a compromise, and thus freely accorded to others that which he claimed for himself—the right of private opinion.

Very early in his Christian life Amos Shinkle faced the question as to the extent of consecration—asking whether it included sentiments and opinions only or also the use of one's substance for the cause of Christ. The dedication to the Master of what men have is essential to true discipleship, and those who desire to serve the Lord must make this inevitable decision. Some meet the obligation by munificent bequests when they die, and their names are garlanded with the praise of the multitude. Others will choose the even tenor of daily service, and, acting as their own executors while they live, will use beneficently what God has given them. The accumulative habit had been formed in Mr. Shinkle's case by a course of swift and successful acquisition, and religion met this intrenched disposition with an imperative summons for the recognition of its claims. He was already in middle life, the scope and tendency of his manhood had been determined, and yet, like Saul of Tarsus, hearing the voice of Jesus, he said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" His piety was not an amalgam of commonplace platitudes and average sentiments. It was more than a mere emotion; it was a primary and inwrought conviction. It would be contrary to his desire, if it could be expressed, and to the modesty of those who bear his honored name, to enumerate the gifts to various causes which signalized the period of his religious life; but it is simple justice to his memory to say that, after meeting the Lord in the way, he gave grandly and continuously until he was called from labor to reward. The Protestant Children's Home, a royal building dedicated to noble uses, was his gift to the city of Covington. More than twenty years ago, during the session of the Kentucky Conference at Union Church, he said to his pastor: "The sight of these poor unpaid preachers moves me. I want to help them out a little.

"Will you ask Bishop Scott to arrange for the distribution of five thousand dollars for their aid in some way so that my name will not be mentioned?" Years after the same pastor, visiting at Mr. Shinkle's home, sat one morning writing at a side desk of his private office in the First National Bank, while its president was attending to many duties. A number of callers came soliciting his help for causes which they represented. The mail, also, was heavy with letters of appeal. As the noon hour came and the two rose to leave he said, "You have heard what has passed. Look at these," pointing to the letters, and then seriously added, "This is about a sample day. I want to do right with my money." There was something more than ordinary in the emphasis of these words; they expressed the governing purpose of his life, and the grave and beloved face, crowned with its winter crest of snowy hair, grew beautiful with a light such as does not shine on sea or shore. Later than this, as if in continuation of the same conversation, he said, "I have given away fifty thousand dollars this year. I found I had to; it was getting too strong a hold on me." Very touching is a paragraph in the Northwestern Christian Advocate:

> A little girl in the Protestant Orphans' Home in Covington, Ky., which Amos Shinkle founded, was giving expression to her delight and gratitude, when the matron asked her if she had thanked God for the Home. To which the child instantly replied, "Yes, I thanked God, and asked him to thank Mr. Shinkle."

The divine plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant," will thus echo in its spoken blessing many voices of childhood as well as of age. Honestly, reverently, day by day, Amos Shinkle did try to do right with his money. That which he did, or declined to do, represented always a conscientious decision.

Very soon after his conversion and identification with Methodism a general desire became apparent for the admission of laymen to the highest council of the Church. The old exclusive method seemed undemocratic and contrary to the liberal policy of our institutions. His keen sense of the fitness of things was in harmony with the spirit of the times, and he at once perceived the importance of a broader basis for the management of church interests. He was actively engaged in the preliminary movement which led to the introduction of lay representation, and in 1872 and at each succeeding session he was a member of the General Conference. The same clear-eyed perception of the thing to be done and how to do it, the same grasp of principles and appreciation of the value of details, characterized him here as elsewhere, and he found himself, without any seeking on his own part, at the front in the management of general interests. His speeches were short, sharp, incisive. His opinion always commanded respect, because it was the view of a man fearlessly honest and intelligently conversant with the subject in hand. Devoted to the interests of the Book Concern, watching its growth with a peculiar pride, thoughtful of the Freedmen's Aid Society and its wide benevolent work in the South, busied with schemes for the poor preachers of the Kentucky Conference, the pillar and pride of the local church, he was a noble specimen of a devout, God-fearing, diligent Christian. The Methodist Episcopal Church needs the brain power of its laity to fashion its policy and direct its institutions. It is comparatively easy to give money, sparing a fragment from the edges of abundance, but to give life is more difficult. Freely and with grateful joy Amos Shinkle for years gave his disciplined business intelligence to the Church of his love, and in this respect is a conspicuous example for imitation by his associates.

Those who have been his pastors know the fine fiber of his personal loyalty. He was anxious, from time to time, as to the man who should fill the pulpit of Union Church, and in order to insure a wise selection asked many questions and closely studied the matter of availability; but when the selection was made the questioning period had passed, and thenceforward he gave complete allegiance to the pastor chosen. No word except of praise escaped his lips, no service was too constant or costly for him to render; he was faithful to the man as the representative of the cause. There was a touch of chivalry in his fidelity. The one who carried for the time the ensign of Christ was associated with the Master, and the standard-bearer became identified in his mind with the standard itself.

Not only character but capacity also is a growth; time is essential for the ripening of power and its adjustment to its chosen ends. The young tradesman in the retail store, the boatman making voyages down the river, passed these preliminary stages and soon became a controlling spirit in great enterprises, the leader and representative of large and influential institutions. There must be something marked in a manhood which can create such a career. Opportunity has much to do with success. The chances that came to Mr. Shinkle out of those rich and rapidly changing years were varied and inspiring. It was a formative condition in which he found himself, one full of visions and voices; and to these he gave instant and earnest heed. His faculty was clear and strong, and an imperial will was ever ready to do its bidding. The gift of insight and the skill of executive control blended perfectly in his mental structure. He could discern the future, and this foresight was the herald of his enterprises. He had the causative power; he could bring things to pass. He never floated idly with the tide, but breasted adverse currents as gallantly as some would sail on a summer sea. His thoroughness was a marvelous trait in his character. A friend asked him late in life, "What has been the chief reason of your success?" "Well," was the quiet answer, "I do not know, except that I try to do everything well, even the small things." He provided against hostile circumstances before their existence; and so calamity rarely interfered with his plans. Patience and hope, or rather the patience of hope, were always present in his disposition. He never was in a hurry; he had the capacity for deliberation. He never sought to skip a season, but considered the year as a whole, and recognized the necessary contribution of each season to success. It was not his habit, in petulant interference with orderly processes, to investigate the seed in the soil in order to discover the state of its progress; he was willing to await the harvest, and all the while was confident, because his conclusion was formed from a study of principles, and he knew that the relation of cause and effect was irreversible. Faculty, on which so much is pivoted in every man's career, was in his case of the highest order, and he adapted it to its special exercise with an unerring discrimination. Much of his unusual ease in action came from inheritance, and much also from close and constant application. Great business men might in certain conditions be great commanders, and, changing the terms of the equation slightly, they might be great statesmen: the basis of faculty is the same in all the instances. They note from afar the strategic points and hold them. They hear the footfall of coming events, faintly echoing on distant corridors, and, recognizing it through the swing and tumult, they are always sure of the issue. There is an element of the intuitional in every eminent success. "Poets are born, not made," has passed into a proverb; but it has a much wider meaning than that expressed in its restricted terms. All high capacity is a matter of original endowment—a perfect germ placed by the angel of the dawn in the cradle—and all of after life is only the growth and expanse of this into fruit and flower.

But there is something more than either opportunity or faculty to be recognized in the analysis of any man's character. If there is a lack in the quality of moral fiber the loss is fatal beyond repair. More or less all men are misjudged. Manner goes further in certain circles than manhood. The decorum of the drawing room is counted as more important than force in field or forum. But more and more society is beginning to consider men, in its final estimate, with reference to that interior disposition which is the real center and soul of life. Amos Shinkle was always practical, dealing in definitions and first principles. He kept to the main current, discarding both eddies in the stream and incidents on the shore. The word "ought" was the dominant word with him in the settlement of every question. He approached all matters for decision from the ethical side. Righteousness, in his conception, was religion. A man who constantly studies life from this point of view may make occasional mistakes, from partial light and infirmity of judgment, but cannot go far astray, for his general course is according to law, and obedience is power. Those who were near enough to Mr. Shinkle to hear his heart-beats were never in doubt as to his invincible intention to do right under all circumstances.

Ex-Governor Fisk, of Kentucky, a business associate and friend of long standing, in a recent letter thus estimates him:

> I have seen Colonel Amos Shinkle almost every business day while we were at home during the last thirty years, and often two or three times a day. We have been directors in numerous corporations almost as long, and in all of these Colonel Shinkle was the guiding mind; his judgment was always approved. A man of strong will, outspoken, frank, honest, in fact, a man of wonderful mental versatility, yet never arrogant or supercilious, he always sought in the kindest manner the views of his associates, yielding to their suggestions without hesitation; and thus harmony prevailed in all of these associations, and each of them prospered during his connection with them. His commanding abilities brought him to the presidency of every one of them except the Kenton Insurance Company, and that he declined to accept. In all my intercourse with Mr. Shinkle I never heard him utter an improper word or expression, and never knew him to do an act which could be criticised. He was a Christian gentleman without an effort, always exemplary, discreet, and wise in speech and deed. The confidence of his associates in the integrity of his judgment was supreme, and the results of his various administrations fully justified this trust.

Dr. Cranston, senior agent of the Western publishing house, from a different point of view expresses a similar judgment:

In his relations with the publishing agents he was never autocratic. He never dictated in what pertained to our direct responsibility, never hampered us; always ready to counsel, he never patronizingly counseled. He watched the drift of things as shown by the books, observed the methods employed, and gave commendation or caution as he deemed fit, and was always open to conviction rather than tenacious of opinions made up with only partial data. In administration he often deferred to our judgment, while absolutely inexorable in insisting that everybody should keep to the Discipline and the General Conference directions. He stood squarely upon the law as to Book Committee prerogatives, but was just as firm for the rights of other officials. It was a delight to work with him; his intense loyalty to the Church was contagious and inspiring. His presidency of the Book Committee was especially commended by all our Eastern members and the New York agents as absolutely impartial. In the Executive Committee of the Freedmen's Aid Society he was especially useful. Sentiment rarely dictated his vote. He was jealously conservative in the interest of the ever-drained treasury. In matters of policy he was often in the minority; and here is a marvel. Strenuous in advocating his views, when outvoted he never lost his equanimity, never sulked, never evinced the slightest personal feeling toward the opposition, as men in his circumstances, accustomed to being deferred to, are apt to do. The short of it is, Amos Shinkle was a Christian; with all his positiveness in affairs he was considerate, submissive, ever humble in his church and official life. If I write more I shall be unfit for business the rest of the day. My heart weeps over his absence.

A man of his clear-cut, definite opinions would often awaken antagonism. Prosperity, sometimes in the contrast it institutes, excites hostility. He was always magnanimous toward those who from time to time were opposed to him, and even when the victim of unkindness and discourtesy would only say, "I am sorry." He carried no sword in his hand; he was broad and kindly in his judgments. He had, besides, the power to draw men to him in the charm and warmth of the tenderest friendship, and hearts ached when he died because of the overwhelming sense of personal loss.

There is a bit of poetry about almost every man. He may seem cold and prosaic, but somewhere there is the song of birds and the bloom of flowers. The home life of Amos Shinkle was a poem. It was picturesque in its beginning. The wedding journey was taken on a flatboat down the Ohio, and, profitable as a commercial adventure, it was delightful in its promise of increasing domestic joy. He respected and loved his wife with the devout intensity of his strong nature. His only son, inheriting his own sterling character, was a constant pride and joy; and the daughters-in-law and grandchildren as they came were welcomed to the same interior affection. No distrust or suspicion shadowed that ideal household. Sorrow and death, as they entered the charmed inclosure, only tuned into deeper cadence the harp of life, which love took up,

> And smote on all the chords with might,
> Smote the chord of self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.

The last months of Mr. Shinkle's life were active and cheerful. He, intrusted, early in 1892, the presidency of several boards to younger men, and sought something of a respite from exacting responsibilities, but it was not his nature to rest; he was eager and tireless to the last. In the General Conference at Omaha his interest in the proceedings was keen and constant, and his influence was as commanding as at any previous session. Until the end he studied civil and financial problems as carefully as in the past; but his thought chiefly turned in love toward the domestic circle and in gratitude to the kind Providence which had thus far kept him in health and strength. There was no thought, perhaps, of the nearness of the goal, but an unusual gentleness was present in his bearing, a mellow light like the glow of sunset on the hills.

Husband and wife had been long together; they had climbed the hill hand in hand, and stood now on the summit. Half a century of joy and sorrow was behind them. Therefore, dening to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, cards of invitation were sent to friends to visit them November 10, 1892. The evening was as merry as a marriage bell.

Golden bells!
What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!

The stately home, embodying in its noble proportions the results of victorious enterprise, never seemed more spacious and splendid than on that hour when the hundreds gathered from Covington, Cincinnati, Louisville, and distant cities to do honor to those who had lived and loved so long, and lived and loved so well. The fragrance of flowers was still lingering in the broad halls, and the echo of friendly salutations had not altogether died away, when two days afterward another visitor, uninvited, crossed the threshold of the good man's home, bearing a summons whose inexorable authority could not be disputed. For a few hours love and skill ministered to his sufferings, while he shielded his wife from the full knowledge of the sharpness of his pain. But nothing could resist the inevitable, and death conquered. He said, "I cannot see," and then, as the unseen glory came near, tenderly added, "Never mind, Jennie, it is growing light."

It was the earthly end of the man who had been so much to family, friends, and the Church of God. On a perfect November day, while the courts of justice in the city of his residence adjourned in honor of his memory and commercial activity paused to think of his merits, they laid him away with his kindred in Hillside Cemetery to await the resurrection of the just. He was no ordinary man, studied on all sides; truth, courage, fidelity, appear everywhere in his character. He lived each day according to his best light, always devoutly anxious to find and fulfill God's thought; and his works do follow him.

Art. II.—OUR LARGEST SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

The principal and by far the largest school for theological training in the Methodist Episcopal Church recorded, for the year beginning with the Fall Conferences of 1891 and ending with the Spring Conferences of 1892, a membership of 3,515 students, with a faculty of 1,700 "examiners." The students were distributed as follows: First year (on trial), 835; second year (continued on trial), 1,046; third year (deacons of the first class), 993; fourth year (deacons of the second class), 671. The school is a nonresident institution, and the functions of its faculty are limited almost entirely to the conduct of annual examinations.

The conditions of matriculation in the Annual Conference course of biblical and theological study in the Methodist Episcopal Church are: 1. An examination before the local Quarterly or District Conference. 2. A "recommendation" from this body. 3. A satisfactory examination by a committee of the Annual Conference. 4. A recognition of the candidate by the Annual Conference as a probationer, or as "on trial" in the Conference. The candidates thus admitted after two examinations (the first before the Quarterly Conference, and the second before the committee of the Annual Conference) are enrolled as "preachers on trial," and begin a four years' course of study, two of these years as probationers and candidates for the diaconate, and two as full members of the Conference. During these latter two years they prepare as deacons for ordination as presbyters or elders at the end of the full four years' term.

The course of study embraces biblical introduction and exegesis, encyclopedia and methodology, natural, biblical, systematic, historical, comparative, and practical theology, homiletics, and ecclesiastical law, together with studies in universal history, rhetoric, logic, psychology, and political economy. As the young preacher has already been licensed to preach he is employed in regular pastoral and pulpit work, finding in this ample opportunity for practice and experiment, utilizing the results of his studies in the varied work of his office. The laws of the books he transmutes into the habits of professional [illegible]. The theological discussions with which he becomes familiar as a student he turns into discourses for the edification of the people.

In the beginning of the modern Methodist movement the leaders were men of scholarship. Several of them were fellows of the university, engaged in postgraduate study. They were men of fine culture, deep spirituality, and held the true ideas concerning the subordination of all learning to the great ends of spiritual life. The Oxford Club has entered into ecclesiastical history, and to its germinal thoughts we owe the best features of modern Methodism, and in it we have the best prophecy of the possible Methodism of the twentieth century.

After years of study and experience under the leading of the divine Spirit, the most of these Oxford Methodists came into "a large place" and began to proclaim a Gospel new to the age in which they lived. The new putting of the old truth turned up the world in the old way. It turned the world upside down. The Christian Church to-day owes as much to Wesley as to Luther. The growth of the Methodist movement in the British Isles and in America was marvelous, and the demand for men to tell the old story in the new age was so great as to compel Mr. Wesley and his coadjutors to lay hold of others than accomplished scholars for the service. There were not educated men enough to meet the demand of the great revival, and fishermen, colliers, carpenters, as in the first century, were commissioned to go about with the good news from heaven to men.

Mr. Wesley, reluctant, but compelled to recognize this new condition of things, made provision from the beginning, by courses of reading, by lectures, and by class studies, to educate in biblical and theological matters the men on whom he was thus forced to lay his ecclesiastical hands. They could not read Greek and Latin; of physical science they knew little; in belles-lettres they were altogether deficient; but in the knowledge of God and of his Gospel, the ethical standards, and the experimental verities, in their unquestioning acceptance of the exceeding great and precious promises, in gifts of persuasion and exhortation, they were qualified in an extraordinary manner. They were men of practical power, to whose convincing logic even the scholars yielded as with penitence they turned to the Christ whom these rude men of the times proclaimed. What was a necessity at the beginning became later on a settled policy. Neither classical education nor the professional education of the schools was required. Provision was made simply for readings and studies in connection with practical service; and thus sprang up the system of theological training which has characterized the Methodist Church.

The same policy has for centuries obtained in the departments of medicine and law. Men who know medicine, or who know law, even though they lack classical scholarship, are commissioned to practice by the proper authorities. The Baptist Church has to some extent adopted the same policy, although it is among the foremost representatives of the highest ministerial culture through the theological seminary. The Presbyterians, always famous for theological education, are beginning to recognize the same necessity, and committees have been appointed by the General Assembly to take into consideration the practicability of adopting shorter courses of preparatory study, that in exceptional cases men of power, manifestly called of God to the work, may, without the formal processes of professional education, be employed in the regular ministry.

It is not to be denied that the policy of nonresident work has its perils. A Methodist would be untrue to fact were he to deny that the plans for ministerial preparation in his own Church have been abused. False views of human agency and divine operation in the work of grace have led to unwisdom and fanaticism. Certain Methodist ministers have been known to depreciate "culture," to deprecate formal ministerial education, to excessively glorify the evangelistic or revival side of church work, and in more than one case to boast of the want of "taste," "culture," and "refinement" on the part of her ministers. In 1852, when Dr. D. D. Whedon edited the Methodist Quarterly Review, the writer heard the Rev. Mr. Caughey, at that time a famous evangelist, express great regret that instead of giving his talents to evangelizing work Dr. Whedon, as editor of this great organ, should be devoting himself to doctrinal, philosophical, and literary studies. Too many of our earlier ministers shared the same absurd prejudice against culture. The Methodist Church lost immensely by all this. It lost the highest respect of leaders in other Churches, clerical and

It lost the confidence of our own wisest and strongest [illegible]. It was unable to keep its hold upon our best families. [illegible] school girls and boys looked with contempt upon men [illegible] occupying the pulpit, violated the most ordinary laws of [illegible] speech, betrayed an inexcusable ignorance of history [illegible] science, and sometimes ridiculed the Christian people who [illegible] these things into account in forming their estimate of a [illegible] ister. As low standards in the ministry betray themselves [illegible] standards among the officiary of the Church, it came to [illegible] that men without social standing, without stability, emo[illegible]al and fanatical, and men ignorant withal, were set to repre[illegible] the Church as "laymen" before the community.

A course of study was indeed provided for Methodist minis[illegible], but it was inadequate. The superficial examinations by [illegible] untutored youth and men of middle life were clothed [illegible] the full authority of the Christian ministry excited the [illegible] of thoughtful and cultivated men, and of necessity lowered [illegible] moral tone of the men themselves who were admitted by [illegible] light and careless processes into an office which, if it be [illegible] anything at all, must always stand for thoroughness, hon[illegible], and righteousness.

Through all the years of Methodism the best ministers and [illegible] have stood firmly and uncompromisingly for the high[illegible] standards. Through their appeals and efforts a change [illegible] place in popular thought. The Church returned to its [illegible]al platform. Institutions for biblical and theological [illegible] were established. The Conference course of study was [illegible]thened. In many Conferences the examinations were im[illegible]; and to-day there are able and scholarly ministers in our [illegible] Church, and ministers, who are the products of our present [illegible]-school system of theological education, who have found [illegible] welcome as permanent pastors to the best pulpits of [illegible] denominations.

From the very necessity of the situation, the majority of [illegible]sters in the Methodist Episcopal Church must, for years to [illegible], be educated by this method. Every year, every quad[illegible]m, the theological schools and the biblical and theolog[illegible] partments in Methodist colleges will multiply. Every [illegible] number of students in these institutions will increase. [illegible] the Church will still continue to employ and ordain men who have never been graduated from either literary or theological institutions; and the great question which we are bound to consider, and which should long ago have been more thoroughly considered, is this: How shall the Conference system of ministerial training be made more effective? how shall we modify the defects we deplore, extend the functions of the examining committees, elevate the standards of examination, increase educational facilities, and give to candidates for the ministry the advantages of the best instruction and the best criticism while they are engaged in the Conference course of study?

In the number of the Methodist Review for January, 1890, the writer discussed this subject at some length, and proposed "The Itinerants' Club" as a temporary device for calling the attention of the Church to the question of ministerial education. It was urged in that article that those in authority should insist upon the value of the college and theological seminary for men who think of entering the ministry. While not even a majority of our young men might secure these advantages, it was suggested that the various academies and colleges should provide biblical and theological chairs, to anticipate to some extent by studies and lectures the Annual Conference course of study. An appeal was made to the bishops to improve the course required. The Conferences were urged to appoint their best men as examiners. Plans were suggested for ministerial meetings of two or more weeks each year in neighboring colleges and seminaries; for cooperative work in the critical reading of standard theological books; for the establishment or recognition of a periodical to aid students for the ministry; for postgraduate studies in philosophy, literature, science, ethics, politics, and history.

After the article in the January (1890) number of the Methodist Review was in type the writer corresponded with seventeen foremost educators of the Methodist Church on the subject of theological education in our Church, eliciting from them a number of wise suggestions, among these the following: Greater care in the selection of committees; the continuing of the same committee for four years; frequent meetings of candidates for close study under competent instructors; examinations several days or weeks before the sessions of the Annual Conference; the giving of special certificates each year and of a full

It is not to be expected that everybody will approve of the title "Itinerants' Club," or any other title which can be given to it; nor is it a matter of very much importance what it is called. This the writer has insisted upon. He has called the plan a "temporary device" for stimulating interest in the work of ministerial education. The title—"The Itinerants' Club"—is of course thoroughly descriptive. It represents the men who constitute it and the distinctive system of ministerial supply obtaining in their Church. It conveys the idea of conversation and of discussion, scientific and practical—the very feature most needed in these days in the work of ministerial stimulation and education. This is an age of "clubs," of "literary clubs," of "social science clubs," of "tourists' clubs;" and the modern movement we glorify as Methodism began with the "Holy Club" at Oxford. While the societies first called "clubs" about the middle of the seventeenth century, meeting in coffee houses and taverns, gave to the "club" the idea of conviviality, Dean Swift himself, in his letters, said, "The end of our club is to advance conversation and friendship." And so widespread has been the club movement that in the latest and most trustworthy English dictionary the very first definition of "club" is: "A company of persons organized to meet for social intercourse, or for the promotion of some common object, as literature, science, politics," etc. Plato's Academia, where men of scholarship met for conversation and discussion, is that far a good model after which to frame this meeting of ministers in the interest of higher personal and professional culture. Let us not, however, be hindered in a good work through indecision as to a name. Whatever the movement may be called it will be a club, and so long as Methodist ministers constitute the majority it will be an "Itinerants' Club," let us call it what we please—a "Christian Institute," a "Church Assembly," a "Ministerial Institute," a "Conference School of Theology," a "Conference Institute of Theology," the "Christian Academia," or any one of a dozen possible titles besides.

Let us state the precise objects of the proposed plan for promoting ministerial education, through the club or institute, under Annual Conference auspices.

1. The Itinerants' Club should train our junior preachers in the principles and methods of true study, showing them how to think, talk, and write; how to fix attention; how to reason; how to see two sides of the same subject with judicial impartiality; how to form the habit of thinking. It seeks to guide them in the study of the actual problems, personal, social, religious, ethical, political, which they encounter in everyday life—problems to which, as never before, the highest scholarship and the most acute critical faculty are now addressing themselves—problems which the common people are everywhere pondering. Our ministers must be trained to think as ministers, on all subjects which relate to the individual, the family, the community, the nation, from the biblical, the Christian point of view, weighing men, not as materialists do, but as Jesus did, taking in their full spiritual endowment, responsibility, and destiny. To know men is worth more than to know books; and to know the times in which we live is of supreme importance. Ministers must know what the world is thinking about; what the men and women whom they address every Sabbath are reading; what literary and religious horizon opens about them; what plays are rendered at the theater in the hearing of five or ten times the number of people who are to be found in the churches; what editorial influence immediately affects them; what doubts and difficulties annoy or imperil them; what remedies we may find for them. The minister should be familiar with the struggles the Church has had during the centuries with these same forms of error. Crude ideas in the pew, and outside of the Church among the very large number of people who now rarely occupy the pew, need on the part of the preacher positive convictions, clearly defined, with the ability on his part, in a master's way, kindly, wisely, sincerely, authoritatively, to state what he firmly believes to be the divine truth. We are in the midst of popular superstitions, laxities, bigotries, falsities, all of which we ought to know and to know well, to know their place in the history of opinions, their frequent recurrence through the centuries, their changing forms and fashionable names, and their radical defects. We should be no strangers to Christian Science, Theosophy, Faith Healing, Spiritualism, Socinianism, Agnosticism, hyper-Calvinism, Perfectionism, and all other one-sided puttings and perversions of the truth.

Books will not suffice to set forth the grievous evils of these various forms of heresy and unbelief. Since these exist in the concrete we must see them in the concrete, talk with their living representatives, and investigate as ministers by scientific methods the forms, developments, and baleful effects of these human vagaries. We should be able in a broad and generous way to deal with such deflections from the truth. Ignorance on our part, or superficiality, is inexcusable. Dogmatic denunciation is contemptible. Thus we have, as ministers, a great work to do in the study of local schools of religious thought; and, whether our men come from farms or college halls, they need to be thoroughly schooled in these human and intensely active forms of antagonism to the Gospel. It is in such investigations that the Itinerants' Club may prove a splendid agency. It is a day for careful thinking—with intense solicitude, with profoundest wisdom, with helps from all available sources. Ministers are more likely to study the books and turn them to good account when they have been stimulated and stirred by the exciting problems which are moving the people everywhere. And the discussion of these living themes—the themes of to-day—in club or institute, will spur the ministry to diligence in the investigation of them.

2. The occasional club or institute should present in a helpful way the subject-matter of the Conference course. Conference studies are a means, not an end. The knowledge of the books is not of so much importance, but it is important that we have a living conviction as to the great truths they contain and a determination to understand them in their wide relations. In the Annual Conference course we have provision for studies in natural, historical, biblical, systematic, comparative, and practical theology. Our text-books are helps to the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, which, according to our creed, "contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." Our Methodist theological manuals are the human statements of our reading of God's word. The studies of our preachers must be in these manuals and in the holy authority to which we appeal. What a field for study! What a privilege it is to be intelligently to canvass such questions as suggest themselves the course of study passes before us! Here the Itinerants' Club has opportunity. Two or three young ministers meet together under the guidance of a cultivated and experienced senior; the candidates of a single district or of a Conference convene for a term of days under the instruction of lecturers and teachers; a series of lessons in the various departments of theology, extended through a term of four weeks in a seminary or college, will aid ministers who have not enjoyed the advantages of systematic theological training to get helps in the methods of study and in the subject-matter of study, which will enable them in a most thorough way to self-help as theological students.

3. The Itinerants' Club should bring together in a kind of academic fellowship the various classes of our ministers—the men of sense and experience, who, although lacking collegiate culture, are often men of genius, with judgments disciplined by the contacts and conflicts of real life; our young men from the schools, who know more of literature, science, and the systematic theology of the text-books than of human nature and society; and the men of years, prestige, and power, who, in responsible positions in the Church, have a knowledge of books and men and experience in educational institutions, first as pupils and then as teachers. These classes of brethren in the ministry, meeting to hear discussions, to ask and answer questions, to compare the results of observation and experience, constitute a truly scientific club and may follow the scientific method of collecting and classifying data, deducting general principles, and comparing the results of human logic and hypothesis with the teachings of the Holy Scriptures. By such fellowship we make it possible for each man to contribute his best to the helping of the rest, to cultivate the esprit de corps, stimulate intense activity, develop what is equal to the class chemistry of the schools, illustrate methods of inquiry and methods of discussion, discover laws of adaptation, promote frank and thorough criticism, and train examiners for their important work. Thus iron sharpeneth iron. The spirit of independent investigation is developed, and when high and holy religious motives permeate such convocation the words of the Lord Jesus are fulfilled, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Ministerial education should carry with it in all its processes faith, fervor, and vital experience.

4. The Itinerants' Club should devise ways and means of local work; a system of correspondence between the examiners and the candidates in a given Conference; a system of postgraduate study, including reviews of the Conference course, collateral readings, advanced studies in philosophy, theology, and the practical topics of the times; the full discussion of the social problems of the day in their relation to the Church. The Protestant Episcopal Church has organized a Christian Social Union, a "social university," with courses of readings, leaflets, lectures, branches, conventions, lectureships, professorships, all with a view of making the ministry familiar with the great industrial, social, political problems of the age, problems which, above all other men, ministers should thoroughly understand.

5. The club or institute should discuss in courses of lectures and after-talks the great questions of systematic theology—the idea of God, the Trinity, the Christ, the Holy Spirit, the atonement, the inner life, eschatology, the Holy Scriptures, the ministry, etc. What a help to the study of the books would such a course of oral lectures prove! Having heard for ten mornings a series of talks on the subject-matter of the books to be studied, the candidate would return to his private library with both hints and inspirations to guide in personal work among his books.

6. The club should present series of biographical lectures by men who have given much time to the study of the great characters of the Jewish and Christian systems. What splendid examples for the young Christian minister will be found in the proper presentation of the distinctive views, experiences, and achievements of such men as Chrysostom, Savonarola, St. Bernard, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Edwards, Asbury, Simpson, and Spurgeon!

7. One of the most important elements of the club will be the actual class-work. It is possible thus to conduct recitations in Hebrew and New Testament Greek, in order to put young men in the way of self-training in these important languages: in the English Bible—the history of the book, the history in the book, the doctrine of the book (as to canon, inspiration, etc.), doctrines in the book, the book in the Church; in exegetical studies, and how to pursue them, especially those prescribed in the Conference course on the Pentateuch, Isaiah, the gospels, and the Pauline epistles; in the study of the Discipline, parliamentary law, and voice culture; and in music, in order to restore if possible an intelligent enthusiasm in this great agency for captivating the people in the interest of Christian faith and life. All these and other class exercises may be conducted in these club or institute sessions.

8. The soul of the Itinerants' Club will be in the praxes, or criticism, which constitute the chief advantage of the theological seminary. Definitions (written at the moment) of theological and ecclesiastical terms; topical analyses of the great subjects of theology; forms of prayer and benediction; the reading of hymns and Scripture lessons by a number of students; the preparation of sermon outlines on texts given at the time; the extemporaneous delivery of addresses and sermons, followed by written and oral criticisms; the use of illustrations; actual practice in committing to memory certain passages; the framing of questions on a given topic; the answering in writing of test questions; methods of teaching children and youth in Bible history, geography, ethics, doctrine. There is literally no end to the devices for affording practice under criticism to the young men who attend these occasional conventions.

9. The Itinerants' Club gives opportunity for conversations, in brief sentences or in addresses limited to two minutes each, on such themes as the following: "Ministerial Education," "Systems of Examination," "Music and the Church," "Ordering of Public Worship," "Pulpit Blunders," "Liturgical Elements in Worship," "Young People's Societies," "Needs of the Sunday School," "Prayer Meetings," "Class Meetings," "How to Visit the Sick and Afflicted," "How to Deal with the Question of Popular Amusements," "Young Men's Christian Associations," "Brotherhood of Christian Unity," "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union," "The Cause of Temperance," "The Parish Hour" (a plan for giving religious instruction in the church one day in the week), "Church Finances," "Church Records," "Church Benevolences," "Church Letters," "The American University," "Our Nearest College,"

"The Home Power of the Church," "Mothers' Meetings," "Relation of Baptized Children to the Church," "Book-Concern Concerns," "What the People are Thinking About, and What They Think About Us as Ministers," "Revivals, Revivalists, and Reactions," "The American People and Other Peoples in America—How to Find, Know, Evangelize, Educate, and Elevate Them," "The Connectional Idea in a Single City," "The Women Workers of the Church," "How to Carry Our Best Plans of Work to Country Places," "The General Rules—How Far to Follow Them Literally in Life and Administration," "Why We Lose So Many Ministers and Members," "The Law of Adaptation in the Methodism of the Twentieth Century," "The Higher Criticism," "The New and the Old Theology," "The Substance of Doctrine," "The Sacraments—Their Signification, and the Order of Administration," "The Presiding Elder at His Best," "Little Things that Mar a Minister's Influence," "The Church and Chautauqua," "The American Public and the Roman Parochial Schools," "The Ballot Box and the Church," "Bad Books," and "The Sacredness of Marriage." To a great extent these topics may be selected with a view to the training of our young men in leading doctrines and duties of the ministry.

10. There are many miscellaneous exercises by which the tension of study may be relieved and in many cases the spirit of devotion promoted. It would be well, for example, to have from a layman a pleasant talk on "A Word About the Pulpit from the Pew;" from a good sister in Israel, "A Woman's Word to the Preacher;" from the examiners, "A Bit of Counsel to the Candidates;" from a candidate, "Words from the Candidates to the Examiners." One of the most delightful and almost recreative exercises in an Itinerants' Club would be free reminiscences, limited to three minutes for each speaker, on "The Best Sermon We Ever Heard," or "The Severest Pulpit Experience We Ever Had." If during the sessions of the Club there could be an hour each day given to the representative of some other Christian denomination, to set forth in his own way the distinctive views and policies of the Church which he represents, we should be able to understand each other better and in all probability to do greater justice to each other. Why should not a Roman Catholic be invited to tell us from his own point view what his Church believes? Why not grant the same privilege to a Unitarian, a Presbyterian, a Baptist, a Congregationalist, a Swedenborgian, a Jewish rabbi, etc. A Methodist minister should learn the views of all other schools of theological and ecclesiastical thought from representatives of such schools. If theological seminaries would more faithfully set forth to young students the real opinions of "heterodox" and other "orthodox" teachers there would be less surprise in the after years, as these pupils come to see in another light the misrepresented schools of their earlier years.

11. The chief object of the Itinerants' Club should be the presenting of higher ideals of manhood—broad, well-balanced, earnest, and cultivated manhood—in which we have the best human guarantee of ministerial efficiency. It matters little what fervors of feeling are kindled by a sermon if he who hears lacks confidence in and respect for the man who speaks. Manhood, high, generous, self-possessed, righteous, gentle manhood—this is the demand of the hour! Meditations about, aspirations after this lofty ideal form fit end for a special service in every ministerial institute, club, or conference. There are those besides the writer who will long remember the solemn meeting for hymns, scripture readings, and silent prayer at the Spokane Itinerants' Club two years ago, and especially that "early service," when, before daybreak, a company of fifty earnest ministers met in the church to celebrate the holy communion, to make consecration of every faculty and possibility to the Blessed Saviour, whose "real presence" that morning no one in that room for a moment doubted.

12. The temporary club or institute must develop into a permanent and fully organized school of theology, with the board of bishops as its controlling council, the senior bishop as its president, and with possibly a secretary, elected by the General Conference, who shall conduct correspondence with the "examining committees" and the "faculties" of the several Annual Conference departments. The time may come when a scheme containing many of the suggestions submitted to the last General Conference, and by that body referred to the bishops, may be adopted. The most active advocate of the proposed scheme, the Rev. Dr. C. M. Heard, of Minnesota Conference, in his paper of reference to the bishops, closes his appeal with the admirable words of President W. F. Warren, of Boston University, written twenty years ago, in describing the Methodist Episcopal Itinerant Theological Seminary: "There is in this country one theological school of special interest. It is the largest in the world. Its last freshman class numbered seven hundred and ninety-three. The entire number of students now in attendance is about three thousand. While other theological institutions have required but a brief three years' course of study this one from the beginning prescribed four years. . . . Its alumni are already numbered by tens of thousands. Its compass is broader than the continent."

Let us hope and strive for the full recognition of this magnificent institution and its development into vigorous life by Annual and General Conference action, by college, university, and theological seminary cooperation, by a sytem of correspondence study, by regularly appointed sessions of institutes, theological classes or clubs, by quarterly or at least semi-annual examinations, and by rigid tests at the door of every Annual Conference, that men called of God to be exhorters, local preachers, or "supplies" be not crowded through the carelessness of men into the ranks of the regular traveling ministry. Let none be ordained preachers and pastors whom God has not called as such.

The suggestion of the Rev. B. A. Kemp, of Indiana, is worthy of careful examination. It provides for the simultaneous study of the Conference course, by which ministers of the four years' classes may pursue the same studies at the same time, just as in the International Lesson System and in the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. It is only at first thought that the plan appears impracticable or out of harmony with a progressive course of studies. What a stimulus to the schools of all grades, to the church press, to the lecturers on all biblical, theological, and ecclesiastical subjects, and to all students of the four years' and of postgraduate courses would this scheme prove to be! What a promoter of religious study among our laymen!

Whatever general institution the Church may in her wisdom finally organize for the promotion of ministerial education, we should, as Methodist ministers, one and all resolve,

1. To be students ourselves, whether we be old or young—reading, thinking, conversing, preaching, lecturing, and attend-whenever practicable, institutes, clubs, or conferences which aim to exalt the standards of ministerial culture.

2. In every possible way to guard the doors of the Conference against weak, untrained, incompetent men, yielding to no claim of pity on account of their personal needs and to no argument based upon temporary "success" in church building, debt-raising, or revivals. We want men to preach, to visit, to win men, women, and children to the love and service of Christ, men who know and who are eager to know more, and who seek knowledge to use it for God's glory in the building up of his kingdom. Such men will study diligently and prayerfully. These are the only men needed to-day in the regular ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

3. To persuade young men of parts and piety to consider well the claims of the ministry upon them; to hold themselves in readiness for the call of God; to account collegiate and professional training as included in the divine summons, and to abandon this preparatory process only where, in the judgment of wise men in sympathy with the highest ministerial standards, it is made clear that the divine Providence indicates exceptional conditions. Students—consecrated, persistent students, and only such—are needed in the Methodism of the twentieth century. With the improvement of our public school system, the multiplication of Chautauqua and University Extension agencies, the opening of correspondence classes all over the country in every department of learning, the increase of colleges and of college students, the wide discussion through the widest magazines and on the rostrum of the profoundest questions of religion—that pulpit must fail to command public respect and attention which does not present in a thoughtful, wise, and forcible way the great and glorious teachings of our holy religion.

Art. III.—BALAAM AND HIS DAY.

Nothing in the story of the Exodus is more fascinating than the episode of Balaam. Its chief actor arouses for the occasion an interest as lively as does Moses himself. Who is this personage that with meteoric splendor sweeps into Israel's horizon, and, vanishing in blood and darkness, leaves such trails of light upon the sky—before whose sudden glow the steady beams of the familiar luminary, which after forty years of guidance now draws near its setting, seem suddenly to lose their luster and warmth? Men gaze and wonder and feel that the solution is beyond them. The most wide and careful search fails to reveal the personality of Balaam, and one must finally exclaim, with regret, "How little is known of him!" We may, however, profitably gather and arrange what little is known, may find a few analogies, and may fix the limits of the unknown and unknowable.

Balaam rises at once and unheralded, as Elijah "stood forth" unannounced before Ahab. He is seen far northeast of Moab and Canaan, probably among those mountain ranges so well made known to us a thousand years later by the experiences of Xenophon. Balaam is a warrior and chieftain of his tribe, a man of greed and vanity, but of force as well, and of sagacity so marked that he is among men a prophet and an oracle. His reading of men is unusually correct, and his forecast of an enterprise is singularly accurate. "Whom thou blessest, is blessed." Balaam's opinion in favor of a man or a scheme weighs much. But in this is nothing supernatural; it is no more than the Delphic oracle, by arts which one cannot explain, held and practiced with fair success for a thousand years. Fame and influence like his do not grow in a single night, nor do they stand at all without a basis of real ability in him that has them. One may say that, like many a nobler—because willing—servant of the divine purposes, Balaam, by talents native and acquired, is come to be "a chosen vessel" fitted for a special service on a great occasion.

Upon such a man comes for one day the overmastering energy of the Holy Ghost. The noblest of men's capacities is this, that a spirit is in them, and "the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." The Spirit usually strives with man, or "is straitened" in him (Gen. vi, 3), urging or restraining him with a force clearly felt, but which may also be resisted. This Spirit may enter into a man on special occasions only, as into Saul, King of Israel, putting him for the hour among the prophets, or into that other Saul near Damascus, overpowering his body but not enslaving his will. To Jesus alone was the Spirit given, "not by measure," but in absolute fullness, and that not to control him, but as a demand of the lofty, mysterious, eternal harmony of the divine nature. The Spirit in Balaam takes entire control of his intellect, but does not—cannot—constrain his affections; and he is perfectly aware of his condition. He is in the divine hand as a trumpet, sounding strains which he cannot modify, "to do less or more." He is under more constraint than the ass that he is riding. Lofty thoughts are framed in his mind; great conceptions of life and duty, far-reaching prophetic visions come suddenly to a darkened heathen understanding and emerge in rich poetic utterance. Yet spiritual dominion so complete, though found in this case only, is really no more hard to understand than the daily striving and struggling of the Spirit in mortal souls.

That the divine consent, which Balaam suddenly feels so needful, is given after it had once been refused, is notable. Yet it is in line with the divine treatment of Israel when, because of their importunity, God granted their request but "sent leanness into their soul." A curious analogy may be taken from classical history. A man from Ionia brings to Glaucus, a Spartan, for safe-keeping a sum of money and some tokens like the checks given for baggage on modern railways. This money Glaucus promises to restore whenever duplicates of these tokens shall be presented. After many years the man's sons bring these duplicates and demand the money. Glaucus roughly answers them and goes to Delphi to ask if he may swear that he never received such money. The oracle says in effect, "Yes, swear and make prize of the money, but remember the son of the oath-god!" Glaucus, alarmed, asks pardon for his question, but the answer comes that to put to the oracle such a question is as bad as to do the deed proposed. Glaucus restores the money, but he and his house sink in ruin before the oath-god's anger. So the divine disapproval is manifest, though

Balaam is almost in irony bidden to go; and it darkens all the doings of that day. His persistence in going, even with this stringent limit put upon his speaking, shows that he half hopes the restriction may yet be relaxed, and "the rewards of divination," Balak's silver and gold, may after all come to his itching palm.

Preliminaries being disregarded, the narrative first becomes intense when the chief personages meet, as told in the choice fragment framed into Micah's prophecy. Balak hurries to him with agonizing inquiry as if willing to sacrifice even the heir to his throne if he may thus turn away the divine displeasure and save himself and his kingdom. In answer Balaam's lips are opened to speak the duty of universal man, "to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," a rule so brief, so comprehensive, and so undebatable. What can be added to it? what can be taken from it? It seems so easy, yet who could do this unaided by the energies of the Holy Ghost and the powerful personality of Christ? Thus opens an historic day, ever memorable for its deeds and speakings. One looks to-day from Jerusalem across to Moab's purple range, as if he might now discern Balaam and his train climbing wearily from point to point to find some favored spot where a worthy sacrifice may persuade the divine mind and Balak's hot desire be gratified. As if, forsooth, in face of his opening words, the Lord would be pleased with "thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil!" But, at this first high place of sacrifice, "bless and curse not" is the law set upon Balaam's lips, though his heart be far from it. Sincere, indeed, is he—who would not be?—at least in his last words, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

Then on the top of Pisgah this fruitless effort is renewed. But all is in vain. "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent" and mar the fulfillment of an enterprise—the Exodus—now nearly complete, and a line of blessing long assured by ancient covenant. The prince and the prophet are met by the hard, unanswerable statement of one aspect of the divine nature, its inflexibility. "Hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?"

On the summit of Peor the drama ends. In this, its last un-

...dling, Balaam is spellbound and helpless, while through his ..., as through the far-sounding silver horn of the sanctuary, ... breath of the Almighty proclaims in exultant strains the ...ning fortunes of Israel. His mind is aglow with visions which ... cannot choose but see, and speak that mind he must, though ... lose him Balak's gratitude and gold. He is more than help... ; he turns to do an inexorable task, which he would risk his ... to shun. Where is such another instance of absolute divine ...ntrol of the intellect, despite the strivings of the heart?

Balak, vexed and baffled, speaks reproof and sharp dismissal; ... lo! now opens before Balaam's wondering eyes a vision such ... no mortal had before been allowed to see. The movements ... nations for more than a thousand years proceed before him. What the slow-rolling centuries should bring to pass within a ...nit of a thousand miles he sees at once—the remoter in time ... space rising in perspective as by mirage, like an horizon to ... near and the present. Balaam gazes

> As one who deep in heaven some airy pageant sees.

His tongue would first mention that on which his eye first ...ted. He must have looked westward from Peor, where ...id the acacias the tents of Israel lay, "from Jordan toward ... sunrising," almost at his feet. The lanes of the camp ...med to him as "the rivers of water" that fertilized Mesopo...mia's plains, and the tent-squares as gardens shaded with the ...grant aloe and the spreading cedar. Just in front of him ...ss the Salt Sea was Engedi with the strongholds of the ...ites; and to his left stretched the wilderness of that Ama... who had so fiercely made stand against Israel, breaking ...tward into the ravines and rocky fastnesses of Seir and ...om. Beyond Jordan stretched the goodly land, with val... green with growing corn and hills crested with the battle...ts of towns, as Moses soon after saw it from the kindred ...mmit of Pisgah, and over all rose Hermon as guardian, and ...at goodly mountain," Lebanon. Beyond these and "the ...er streak of sea," unseen but by prophetic vision, Chittim, ...um, Cyprus, was the utmost limit of Balaam's view—to ...m the representative of Greece and the vague, unhistoric ...egean world, now first named in Holy Writ or any other. ...hind him spread the great desert, and beyond its brown edge far away were the Euphrates and his Assyrian home, from which he had come to meet these strange experiences. Better might this place of a vision so sweeping be named the Field of Zophim, the Watchers! Let natural scenery be ever so excellent, it gains some higher quality when it has become associated with great transactions affecting the welfare of mankind. Marathon and Gettysburg would be but tame without such associations; the view from the Acropolis takes from them a new enchantment. And, if historic memories are so effective, what must prophetic vision do but clothe the landscape with glow, color, and movement inexpressible? Man is "the measure of all things," and his part within this wide horizon fills the mind of Balaam. He might say, as Coleridge says of Mont Blanc:

> I gazed upon thee till thy visible form,
> Still present to the outward, bodily sense,
> Had vanished from my thought.

His eye is open, but he sees only nations and peoples rise and break like waves that chase each other upon the shore. The "giant forms of empires on their way to ruin" fill all his horizon boundary. "One by one they tower and are gone." Israel enters, and is among the peoples holding or bordering Canaan as a great lion. Woe to them that stir him up! Then arises, "not now" but more than four hundred years later, a star from Bethlehem, a scepter that shall do valiantly, and all these tribes go down before the sword of David. A few more centuries after Amalek has perished and the Kenite is wasted, the Assyrian comes down "like a wolf on the fold," and sweeps all "with besom wide" into captivity in Balaam's own land beyond the river.

Once more he takes up his parable and declares the last act of the drama before him. "Alas, who shall live when God doeth this?" "Ships shall come from the coast of Chittim." Alexander and his conquering Greeks cross the western sea to crush Asshur and crush Eber—Assyria and the beyond—and these also perish forever. Balaam's vision covers the destinies of these tribes, nations, and empires for more than a thousand years. At the limit of his outlook rises the young man of Macedon, flushed with energy, to build the new East, and the old is swept from the stage forever.

Cyprus, indeed, might well bound his westward vision, so long was it the threshold, the portal line, between the East and Europe. No historic land has so many times changed owners, and each owner, from the Phœnician to the Englishman, has there left traces of his ownership. As one in the Metropolitan Museum of New York studies the Cesnola collection of Cyprian antiquities, he finds them not only rich and various, but distinctively marking more eras of government, society, and art than can be traced in any other territory on earth. Cyprus was then an island, rich and fair. For a hundred miles along its highlands were noble forests which gave the Phœnicians timber and tar for their shipping, and from these forests ran perennial streams to sustain the verdure of the regions below. The copper, nearly pure in its bed, furnished the metal first used by the Greeks in the arts of peace or war, while iron was yet intractable. Ages later, even in Venetian hands, Cyprus was in itself a kingdom. Its forests are now gone, its mines neglected, and the goodly days when it was in the forefront as representative of the European world are never to return. Its early wealth and splendor are known but by scanty record and allusion. Yet these are confirmed and enlarged by the process that is now adding whole chapters to Levantine history, the process of excavation.

Could the seer but have looked farther on that rippling western sea! Copious excavations and careful scrutiny have lately shown that before the Dorians came there must have been in the Peloponnesus a thousand years of vigorous Achæan civilization. This was not only prehistoric but prehellenic even; and when Balaam looked westward it was at its zenith, full of life and splendor and joy. The Dorians came, like the Saxons upon England, to waste and scatter this civilization and build upon its ruins historic Greece; and it is preserved for us only by the Homeric records, which are confirmed by the relics rescued from decay by the shovel and pickax of Schliemann and his company. Argos and Mycenæ, the center of this old Greek life, were not more distant from Chittim than Chittim was from Moab. Yet to Chittim, and no farther, might the vision of Balaam extend. Around and behind this civilization of the kings before Agamemnon, who to the classic poets were in voiceless night, hover the great legendary figures at which the tragedians grasped—the house of Labdacus and the host of shadowy personages who aroused in later ages, as even in our own, lofty and imperishable emotions of the sublime.

One great event, a long stride forward in the progress of our race, was now occurring within the limits of Balaam's westward gaze. Phœnician merchants, devising a shorthand for their bills of lading, had reduced to twenty-two vocal symbols the utterances of "speech-dividing men," and thus invented the true alphabet. No other than this, devised for the needs of busy men, has met the world's demand, and it went soon to Greece, to India, and now to the ends of the earth. The Moabite Stone may be the oldest instance of its use, but there is reasonable probability of its development in Phœnicia in Balaam's day, seven centuries before the date of the venerable stone. And in man's literary history what greater deed than this was ever done?

How, in his sublime trance, were Balaam's eyes narrowed and limited in their range! The glory of Egypt, reviving under Amenophis III and now near the great days of Rameses II; behind him the Accadian Empire now declining; the Hittite, just rising beyond Lebanon; and those Achæan achievements which scholars are now tracing with a glow of energy and gladness well-nigh to an agony—all these are passed in a silence as unbroken as that in which Xenophon led his men over the site where the ruins of Nineveh were hardly yet cool underneath. But what were all these to Balaam? What had these forces of the Gentiles to do for ages yet with the fortunes of Israel?

So it was appointed to this man on his one illustrious day to see far down the line of Asiatic destiny, and glance upon the Greek, and thus upon the Gentile, the modern, world. And now his work is done, and it is with him as when iron, luminous and plastic with heat, returns to its cold, dark, normal hardness. "And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place"—to his own tricks of sorcery, to his own reckless greed, to his own unhindered ways. He is now at liberty to sate his hunger for gold, though it be "the wages of unrighteousness." He can now by the vilest arts damage that Israel upon whom he has just spoken blessings so clear and copious. Indeed, the last state of that man is worse than the first; for to evil he now gives himself, and with low, unclean policy will ruin Israel, through the women of Midian. Had he forgotten his own "parable?" Fiercely as an angry lion Israel springs upon this, his last wayside enemy in the Exodus, and Balaam's poor misled creatures pay a dreadful penalty. "Balaam also the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children of Israel slay with the sword." Those whom he hated have by divine bidding generously spread upon the sacred page these wonders of a day when a heathen, an enemy of Israel and capable of deeds unspeakable, utters lofty sentiments and unfolds wide visions second only to those of Moses himself—a heathen who, from the panorama on which soon after, at his departure from this world, rested the clear eye of the great leader, reads so far down the page that is never dull, the page of human destinies.

As one lingers in thought over this day's doings serious questions will recur and press themselves upon the attention. If all human duty can be compressed into three brief rules, and these can be stated as simply as they came from Balaam's lips; if this statement be owned as true by every human being to whom it is presented, then why is this duty so hard to do? Why left undone? What need should there be of line upon line, of the wealth of revelation, of the manifested Saviour, and of Pentecost? Some noble heathen, Solon, Socrates, Virgil, may have kept this law; but what are they among the millions? The theologian can here muse on man's weakness, on his bent to wrong, on the alliances needed to work in and with him for virtue.

The moralist here finds the mirror accurately held up to nature. The struggle between good and evil in Balaam's character is portrayed in true dramatic unity. His greed is like Macbeth's ambition. He struggles by sacrifice to reconcile with his conscience and the divine will some grasp of the honor and the gold now so near his hand. Conscience he can stifle, but the divine will yields only enough to make its reserve of firmness the more conspicuous. Balaam has set himself intensely to get on in the world. His feet are on the tottering stairway of promotion; by born gifts, by skillful service, and even by the sorcerer's arts he has achieved some upward progress. In all this affair before us his craving for what Balak can give is a disturbing force, pushing him from a base of truthfulness and for the time restrained by divine power alone. This craving degrades Balaam's noble gifts; it darkens his great occasion and cripples all his lofty aspirations. Worldly wealth and fame he must have, though won as the wages of unrighteousness. He is a Macbeth whose way is effectively shut, but in whose heart struggles remorseless ambition, and who, if unhindered, would not be infirm of purpose.

Here, too, is a pure and perfect creed, the very mind of God as to human duty, held in constraint and abeyance by unrighteousness of desire. The affections are hostile to the intellect; the law of the members wars against the law of the mind; the obedience to the divine will is compulsory and brief, and passes with the setting sun. In our own day, thirty-four centuries of human experience intervening, the same phenomena abound, and "the error of Balaam" with its sequel of disaster goes on before our eyes.

Nothing even in the marvelous rhetoric of the Greek outdoes the literary excellence of this presentation of Balaam. The dramatic form is complete, and the unities of time, place, and action are regarded. The actors are even fewer than in "Œdipus Tyrannus," yet the characters, the environment, the thought and movement are clear and simple, while the range is grand beyond all classic conception. Especially the action is rapid and various, and the play of emotions is intense. Balaam, with his eye "fixed on futurity," his hair floating in the wind, his passions beating against the barrier set by the Eternal like waves against a sea-girt rock, scanning to-morrows as they unfold adown the long vista; Balak, fearful of doom, toiling in travel and sacrifice, listening to catch some word of cheer from those prophetic lips, then breaking down in bitter grief and rage of disappointment—these are great tragic characters.

And the quiet close of it all—one's hard-strained attention relieved by the noiseless departure of the angry prince and of the tongue-bound, tongue-loosened prophet—leaves one in calm to ponder as when evening's crimson fringes are let gently down upon a much-meaning, mysterious, weary, anxious day. How often do the flowers of genius bloom and brighten over the ruins of innocence! But nowhere in all literary record is the moral and spiritual contrast between the speaker and the speech greater than in this case of the man whose eyes the Lord opened, but who so madly loved the wages of unrighteousness.

Art. IV.—"THE SUNDAY SERVICE."

The Wesleys, as Church of England clergymen, were from childhood perfectly familiar with the English Book of Common Prayer. The same is true of most of the early Methodists, for they generally attended the established churches during "church hours" and engaged in the parts of the service appointed for the people; and, indeed, it may be asserted that from the liturgy of the State Church they obtained their idea of responses during divine worship. From the frequent "amens" and "glorias" laid down in the formal service it was an easy transition to the freer, and more earnest, though more irregular, ejaculations heard in many a Methodist meeting.

It was quite natural that Mr. Wesley should have a strong attachment to the Prayer Book, around which clustered so many sacred associations connected with his childhood and his maturer life. Born and bred in a liturgical Church, his love for the essential parts of the Anglican liturgy never was broken. In his field services, his early morning meetings, and in his chapel gatherings his ordinary form of worship was exceedingly simple; but he regarded these simple forms as supplemental to the elaborate liturgy of the Establishment, and assumed that the members of his societies generally attended the State Church and took part in the service according to the Book of Common Prayer. In 1766 he said:

> But some may say, "Our own service is public worship." Yes, in a sense; but not such as supersedes the church service. We never designed it should. We have a hundred times professed the contrary. It presupposes public prayer, like the sermons at the university. Therefore, I have over and over advised, use no long prayer, either before or after the sermon. Therefore, I myself frequently use only a collect, and never enlarge in prayer, unless at intercession, or on a watch night, or on some extraordinary occasion. If it were designed to be instead of church service it would be essentially defective; for it seldom has the four grand parts of public prayer: deprecation, petition, intercession, and thanksgiving. . . . But if the people put ours in the place of the church service we hurt them that stay with us and ruin them that leave us. . . . I advise, therefore, all the Methodists in England and Ireland, who have been brought up in the Church, constantly to attend the service of the Church, at least every Lord's day.

Ten years after making this utterance City Road Chapel, London, was projected, and a year later (1777) the corner stone was laid by John Wesley. John Pawson states "that the plan proposed was to build an elegant chapel, such as even the lord mayor might attend, without any diminishing of his official dignity," and that "the liturgy should be read at both morning and evening service." The liturgy was regularly used in City Road Chapel, and there is reason to think that prior to this it was used in other chapels—for example, that in West Street; but Mr. Wesley was ripening for a change even in this respect.

American Methodism was demanding his most serious thought. Appeals came to him for some measure of relief that would give the American Methodists regular ministers and ordinances of their own. The colonies had gained their independence, a new nation had been formed, and the relation of American Methodism to the Church of England had been radically changed. In 1784 he decided to act, first, by sending ordained ministers; secondly, by giving them a supervisional ecclesiastical government under ministerial superintendents, and, thirdly, by furnishing them with forms of service. At Bristol, England, on the first day of September, 1784, assisted by two of his episcopally ordained presbyters, he ordained Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey as elders. On the 2nd of September he set apart the Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., to the position of superintendent, and designated the Rev. Francis Asbury for the same office. On the 9th of September he wrote the preface to a service book for the use of the American Methodists. On the 18th Dr. Coke, with Whatcoat and Vasey, sailed for America, carrying with him the new service book in sheets.

The making of this service book for the Methodists in the United States of America is one of the noteworthy incidents in early Methodist history. Not only is the work interesting in itself, but also because of the light it throws upon Wesley's relation to the Church of England and his intention in regard to the ecclesiastical status of his followers in the new transatlantic nation. It is, therefore, not merely a literary curiosity, but at the same time a valuable historical production, and worthy the attention of the student of ecclesiastical history. As a study in history we present it for a brief consideration.

When Wesley began the preparation of this service book is not certain. It would seem almost incredible that he could have prepared it between the date of the preface and the time when Dr. Coke and his companions sailed. The preface shows that Wesley's work on the book had been completed when the preface was written; so that the editorial work was finished by the 9th of September. The question therefore arises as to whether Wesley could have done this work between that date and the first day of the month, when he ordained his new elders. Mr. Wesley was a very rapid worker, and, as the new book was mainly an abridgment of the Book of Common Prayer, much of the work, doubtless, was done by drawing a pen through a printed copy of the English Prayer Book. Mr. Wesley reached Bristol on the 28th of August, several days before the ordination, so that he could have used that time. But we need not limit him to such a short period. It is evident that before he met with the British Conference on the 27th of July he had decided on the new departure for American Methodism, and there is reason to think that coupled with the determination to ordain ministers was the purpose to give them a form of worship; and he may have put the book in the hand of the printer abont that time. In the book itself there are evidences of hasty preparation, and yet it is probable that many changes had been thought about for a long time. However that may have been, the unbound copies of the book were on board the vessel with Dr. Coke by the 18th of September.

The title-page is as follows: "The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America. With other Occasional Services. London: Printed in the Year MDCCLXXXIV." The preface is as follows:

I believe there is no liturgy in the world, either in ancient or modern language, which breathes more of a solid, scriptural, rational piety than the Common Prayer of the Church of England; and though the main part of it was compiled considerably more than two hundred years ago, yet is the language of it not only pure, but strong and elegant in the highest degree.

Little alteration is made in the following edition of it, except in the following instances:

1. Most of the holy days (so called) are omitted, as at present answering no valuable end.

2. The service of the Lord's day, the length of which has often been complained of, is considerably shortened.

3. Some sentences in the offices of baptism, and for the burial of the dead, are omitted; and,

4. Many psalms are left out, and many parts of the others, as being highly improper for the mouths of a Christian congregation.

BRISTOL, September 9, 1784. JOHN WESLEY.

In his circular letter to the American Methodists, written the next day, Mr. Wesley says:

I have prepared a liturgy little differing from that of the Church of England (I think the best constituted national Church in the world), which I advise all traveling preachers to use on the Lord's day in all the congregations, reading the litany only on Wednesdays and Fridays, and praying extempore on all other days. I also advise the elders to administer the supper of the Lord on every Lord's day.

We may now note some of the particulars in which Wesley's Service Book varied from the Book of Common Prayer. It will be noticed that even in his day complaint was made concerning the length of the English service, and Wesley anticipated by at least a century recent efforts to curtail their length. Wesley's book has the Morning and Evening Prayer; but whereas the English service has the title, "The Order for Morning Prayer, Daily throughout the Year," Wesley's title is, "The Order for Morning Prayer, every Lord's Day." Both open with sentences from the Scriptures, but some of the prayers Wesley omits, while others he abbreviates. In every instance he strikes out the word "priest" and inserts the word "minister." He strikes out the English rubric: "The absolution, or the remission of sins, to be pronounced by the priest alone, standing; the people still kneeling," and instead of the absolution inserts a simple petition, "O Lord, we beseech thee, absolve thy people from their offenses," etc. Wesley omits "The Creed of Saint Athanasius" and uses only the Apostles' Creed. He omits many of what he terms the "so-called" holy days, retaining Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension Day, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday. In the body of the work he omits a number of special services, including "The Order of Confirmation." In the form for the baptism of infants he strikes out all reference to godfathers and godmothers, and the question, "Dost thou, in the name of this child, renounce the devil and all his works?" From the old form he struck out the word "regenerate" in the sentence, "Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." When he came to the ordinal he made sweeping changes. First, he entirely eliminated the Preface, which said: "It is evident unto all men, diligently reading the Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' time there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's Church: bishops, priests, and deacons." Then in the several services he made vital alterations. For "priest" he substituted "elder," and for "bishop" he substituted the title "superintendent," while the title "archbishop" he eliminated without even suggesting a substitution, as though he did not believe in an ecclesiastical officer of such rank. His knife did its sharpest work among the Articles of Religion. The thirty-nine articles were cut down to twenty-four. Out of some articles he cut portions, while other articles were entirely eliminated. Thus from Article VI he struck out all reference to the apocryphal books. Article VIII, which declared that "the three creeds" "ought thoroughly to be received and believed," was omitted. Article XVII, "Of Predestination and Election," with its alleged Calvinism, was cast aside.

These instances will indicate the character of the changes made in the Anglican Common Prayer. Tyerman, the English Methodist historian, says:

> Upon the whole we regard Wesley's expurgations as emendations (except in the case of the Psalms). His Prayer Book is purged from popish and Calvinian errors, and in that respect is superior to the Prayer Book of the Church of England.

Dr. Abel Stevens, the American historian, declares:

> Wesley's abridgment of the Common Prayer was exceedingly well done; superior to that adopted by the Protestant Episcopal Church. It includes the very quintessence of the English liturgy in the best possible form.

However, we care less for the rhetorical skill which is manifested than for its indication of Wesley's doctrinal views and ecclesiastical intentions. Those who consider Wesley's service book as identical with the Anglican Book of Common Prayer make a great mistake, for its variations are vital. Wesley's changes in the book reveal changes in his own mind. The once high churchman had become antisacerdotal. The elimination of the word "priest" and the substitution of "minister" or "elder" is only one proof out of many showing that he had become a low churchman. The change in ecclesiastical views is quite as evident as his change in doctrine. Some persist in saying that Mr. Wesley never intended that the Methodists in America should become a distinct Church, and that he never sanctioned their attempt at church organization. Such objectors seem to be blind to the fact that Wesley gave the American Methodists an ordained ministry and a supervisional government, and they seem oblivious to the meaning of his Prayer Book. He did not send them the Anglican Common Prayer, but The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America. They were not to use the book of the English Church, but to have their own, and their own was radically different from that of the Church of England in many vital points. The Methodists in America were, therefore, according to the intention of Mr. Wesley, to have their own service, and not that of the Anglican Church, and they were to receive the ordinances from their own ministry, and not to depend upon the clergy of other denominations. The book provided by Mr. Wesley had services for ordaining deacons and elders and setting apart elders as superintendents; so it was manifest that he intended American Methodism should make its own ministers. Further, Mr. Wesley's book furnished the American Methodists with Articles of Religion which differed in many respects from those of the English Church. These things could not mean that Mr. Wesley thought the American Methodists were, or that he intended them to remain, in the Church of England or to enter a Church essentially the same as the Church of England. He provided an ordained ministry, a creed, a service, and a government. These things meant a Church, and a Church differing from the State Church of England as these features differed from the peculiarities of the Anglican Church; and Wesley's Prayer Book, The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America, with Other Occasional Services, is overwhelming proof that Mr. Wesley intended the American Methodists to be an independent Church—a complete Church, with its own Articles of Religion, its own regular ministry, its own services, "in which the pure word of God" should "be preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered."

Some may ask whether this service book was used by the Methodists in the United States. In view of slanderous assertions made by a Protestant Episcopal clergyman in a book called A Methodist in Search of the Church,* this question should be answered. The author of this effusion makes one of his characters, who is engaged in proselyting, declare that the Methodist Episcopal Church "suppressed it," and goes on to say:

> Our tradition is that the whole edition of Mr. Wesley's Prayer Book fell into the hands of Bishop Asbury (perhaps was directed to him from England), and that he, judging it injudicious, destroyed the whole, with the exception of a few copies which were accidentally mislaid.—Pp. 103, 104.

This is either a brazen falsehood, invented for the purpose of misleading, or it is a revelation of inexcusable ignorance, for no one who does not know the facts should undertake to write history, even for the purpose of making proselytes.

Less than two months after Dr. Coke landed in America the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America was organized, and that before the Protestant Episcopal Church was formed; and at the Conference where the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized it was agreed to use "the liturgy as presented by the Rev. John Wesley," and the Minutes of that Conference declare that the ministers were to be set apart "according to the forms of ordination annexed to our liturgy," and the ministers were "to read the Morning and Evening Service out of our liturgy on the Lord's day." This action does not look very much like suppression. After this time the service was promptly introduced into the churches, as Jesse Lee tells us, "in the large towns and in some country places."

In less than two years another edition was printed in London, by Frys and Couchman, Worship Street, Upper Moorfields. The title-page of the edition of 1786 is a little different from that of the first, as it reads: "The Sunday Service of the Methodists in the United States of America," instead of "in North America." The new nation was recognized, however, in the first edition, for in it Mr. Wesley had a prayer for "the Supreme Rulers of these United States." In the edition of 1786 also appeared the new article of religion as agreed upon by the organizing Conference, namely, "Article XXIII, Of the Rulers of the United States of America."

In the same year, with the imprint of the same printers, appeared another edition, entitled The Sunday Service of the Methodists in His Majesty's Dominions. It was a bold move to publish this Prayer Book for the use of "the Methodists in His Majesty's Dominions," where the State Church existed, and yet this was done five years before the death of Mr. Wesley. If this was not "separation" in form it was a departure that meant separation in fact.

That Mr. Wesley's Prayer Book was used in England is a matter of history. An English author observes that "when circumstances arose which compelled the Methodists to hold services during church hours Mr. Wesley took care that the form of worship should be assimilated to that of the Church as much as possible; and he, therefore, compiled an abridgment of the Book of Common Prayer." As we have seen, however, the assimilation "as far as possible" meant a radical difference. The English minutes of 1788, about three years before Mr. Wesley's death, have the following order:

> The assistants shall have discretionary power to read the Prayer Book in the preaching houses on Sunday morning where they think it expedient, if the generality of the society acquiesce with it.

In 1795, about four years after the decease of Mr. Wesley, the Conference Minutes contain the following:

> Wherever divine service is performed in England, on the Lord's day, in church hours, the officiating preacher shall read either the service of the Established Church, our venerable father's Abridgment, or at least the lessons appointed by the calendar. But we recommend either the full service or the Abridgment.

Similar action was taken in 1806. In 1815 a new edition of the Abridgment was ordered, one size for the pulpit and another for "individual accommodation." The order for the use of the full service or the Abridgment was repeated in 1839, and the writer has an English print of The Sunday Service published in 1842. One remarkable feature of the English edition is that it is essentially the same as the editions used in America, even including the ordination services, the provisions for deacons, elders, and superintendents, and also the Articles of Religion. Instead, however, of the prayer for "the Supreme Rulers of the United States," there are prayers for the sovereign and all the royal family.

The later editions are not of so great historic interest; but what must be inferred from Mr. Wesley's re-issue of The Sunday Service for "the Methodists in His Majesty's Dominions?" Is it not a fair interpretation to conclude that he intended them to use it in place of the Church of England Book of Common Prayer, and that he was looking forward to a time when all the British Methodists would have their own service in "church hours" and no longer be dependent upon the Establishment? When he gave them a service book differing so radically from the established Common Prayer was he not sanctioning or actually making a separation from the State Church? Subordinate acts sometimes indicate quite as much as avowed decisions.

But we turn again to Wesley's Prayer Book in the United States. Dr. McMasters, in the book before mentioned, again makes one of the characters in his marvelous fiction, which is a stranger to fact, say that it is his "honest and clear conviction that the book was destroyed or suppressed" (p. 106), and that "to all appearances the Methodist Church was guilty of a suppressio veri" (p. 108). We will not assert that the author was knowingly guilty of the same thing, but if not it is very manifest that he was ignorant as to the matters upon which he wrote. Instead of being suppressed it was formally adopted by the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, as we have seen, a second edition was printed. The Disciplines of 1788 and 1789 refer to the use of "the liturgy," and there is a record of its use in 1788 by Bishop Asbury at Uniontown, Pa., when "the morning service was read as abridged by Mr. Wesley." There are also evidences of its use at later periods. The Sunday Service, as Dr. Abel Stevens observes, "has never been formally abrogated," but after some years it fell into gradual disuse. Why it was informally abandoned is a question of some interest. Jesse Lee says that "some of the preachers who had been long accustomed to pray extempore were unwilling to adopt this new plan." Dr. Stevens attributes the gradual disuse of The Sunday Service to the encroachments of preliminary services, which infringed upon the hour for preaching and so compelled the omission of the liturgy. He remarks:

It was used for a few years, in both cities and country, in the principal churches; but Sabbath love feasts, or other extra services, frequently preoccupied the time allotted to it, and, from being occasionally omitted, it at last fell into disuse.*

Possibly there were other reasons. Thus, it is more than probable that many of the churches of that period were too poor to buy a sufficient number of books to supply the members of their congregations, and many of the people were too poor to provide themselves with the service. Then the difficulties of transportation through woods, over mountains, and across unbridged rivers made it difficult to supply the people, especially in sections where the services were held in school buildings or private houses. A further explanation may be found in the frequent shifting of preachers after very short pastorates, thus sending preachers who knew the service to congregations where it was not used, or sending preachers who were not familiar with it to churches where it had been used.

Commenting upon the abandonment of "The Sunday Service" Dr. Stevens says:

I am not aware that any effort has ever been made, in the General Conference or otherwise, to revive its use. The expedience of its restoration has occasionally been discussed in the church papers. Some Methodists have supposed that its use in our large communities might be desirable, and that, as the Methodist Episcopal Church, rather than the Protestant Episcopal Church, was, by its precedent organization, as well as its Articles of Religion, its ritual forms, and its numerical preponderance, the legitimate successor of the English Church in the United States, its continued use of the liturgy would not only have attracted to it most immigrant communicants of the parent Church, as well as other persons and families who prefer liturgical services, but it would have enabled it to supersede more effectually than it has the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country. It cannot be questioned, however, that a large majority of Methodists believe that any such advantage would have been more than counterbalanced by many disadvantages.†

As to this we have no opinion to present, since at this time our work is purely historical.

* Stevens's History of the Methodist Episcopal Church, vol. ii, p. 198.

† Ibid., note, p. 199.

The morning and evening prayer, the litany, and various special prayers disappeared from the services of the churches, but all the matter of Wesley's Prayer Book was not lost. In 1790 the Articles of Religion were printed in the Discipline, and in 1792 the formal services for baptism, the Lord's Supper, matrimony, the burial of the dead, and the forms for setting apart the ministry were bound with the Discipline. These services have been modified from time to time, and especially by the General Conference of 1864, which also added new services for the reception of members, the laying of a corner stone, and the dedication of a church; but in the older forms the essential features of Wesley's service book still remain.

In 1792 action was also taken providing "for the establishment of uniformity in public worship amongst us on the Lord's day," which reveals the fact that there was lack of uniformity. The regulation enacted required "the reading of a chapter out of the Old Testament and another out of the New" in the morning, and, in "the afternoon service," "one chapter out of the Bible," besides singing, prayer, and preaching. In 1804 it was ordered that in the afternoon service there should be "one or two chapters out of the Bible." In 1824 a new paragraph was introduced, as follows:

> In administering the ordinances, and in the burial of the dead, let our forms of Discipline invariably be used. Let the Lord's Prayer also be used on all occasions of public worship in concluding the first prayer, and the apostolic benediction in dismissing the congregation.

In 1864 the directions were amended so that it was specified that the congregation should join in the "audible repetition" of the Lord's Prayer; "a doxology was to be sung at the conclusion of each service;" the apostolic benediction was to "be invariably used;" and the people were exhorted "especially to respond to the prayers of our Ritual." The General Conference of 1888 inserted a permission for responsive reading of the Scriptures. This brings us to the order of service for the Lord's day as it now stands, for the law in the Discipline of 1892 is substantially the same as that of 1888.

All these changes from 1792 to 1892 were for the purpose of securing "uniformity in public worship," and yet perfect uniformity has not been secured. There is a general desire for uniformity, but this desire exists where there are divergent ideas as to the proper form. In some quarters there is a demand for greater elaboration, while in other places the people insist upon severe simplicity; but in almost every section there is variation from the indicated order, while some professedly strict constructionists omit parts and insert new items at pleasure, but, with remarkable inconsistency, cry out against others who do the same thing in a different way.

Perhaps those who do not adhere strictly to the form in the law take cover under the qualification "as far as possible," which did not appear in the order until 1888. It may be held that this allows latitude. The enactment of 1888 read: "Let the morning service be ordered, as far as possible, in the following manner," etc.; and the Discipline of 1892 reads: "As far as possible the following shall be the order of the morning service," etc. This, some may claim, permits considerable variety according to circumstances, the judgment of the pastor, or the tastes of the people; but, if so, it does not "establish uniformity in public worship among us on the Lord's day," as was the intention of the lawmakers. That some degree of uniformity is desirable will be admitted by all; but many will dissent from the idea that there must be a cast-iron rule from which there can be no variation. Our twenty-second Article of Religion says:

> It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same or exactly alike; for they have been always different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word.

Yet, while Methodism implies flexibility and practical adaptation to differing and changed conditions for the purpose of most effective church work, it must be admitted that everywhere its Sabbath services should have sufficient uniformity to give them a familiar denominational cast.

Our purpose, however, is not to show what ought to be done in regard to the present order of worship, but merely to call attention to a few fundamental points of an historical character connected with what has been termed Mr. Wesley's Prayer Book. The great value of this study in Methodist history is in the direct light and the side light which this investigation throws on the early history of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Wesley's book, called The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America, with Other Occasional Services, is one of the foundation stones of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America. It was the first formulation of doctrine and polity for American Methodism as a distinct Church. In its Creed and Articles of Religion was presented the doctrine of the Church, and the polity of the new Church was suggested by the distinctive titles given its ministers, namely, deacons, elders, and superintendents. It has value as showing by comparison with the English Book of Common Prayer not only what Wesley rejected, but also what was rejected by the American Methodists, for the eliminations from the old Prayer Book imply quite as much as the new service book expressed.

The Sunday Service, in connection with the "Circular Letter" written by Wesley and subsequently bound with the service book, conclusively answers the objector who claims that Wesley never intended the American Methodists to be separate from the Church of England, and proves that he intended the Methodists in the United States to be independent of all other bodies and to be a Church with its own ministry, with full services conducted and sacraments ministered by its own clergy, and with a complete ecclesiastical organization; and in these particulars what was manifestly intended was freely agreed to by the American Methodists, who had a right to decide for themselves.

Art. V.—CITY MISSIONS AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

It is a noteworthy characteristic of current discussion that even secular minds are seeing, amid the forces which have made our century one of progress, the figure of the foreign missionary. To find the record of his service it is no longer necessary to take down from our shelves the quaint and frequently ill-written volumes of pious biography. We go as often to the treatises on ethnic and linguistic science, to the works of travel and exploration, to the commercial reports, to the scientific journals, and even to the columns of the daily press. Men who are careful to minimize his motives cannot afford to depreciate his influence. Weary as the world is of the rage for centennializing, it is constrained at this reflective epoch to admit that William Carey and his successors have had not only an intense zeal to save human souls, but a profound influence toward the betterment of human life.

It is not equally clear that the world has discovered the city missionary. The Christian worker in foreign fields has made notable contributions to government, language, commerce, art; to the circle of sciences—geography, ethnology, geology, botany, zoology, comparative religion; to the higher pursuits of philosophy and of philanthropy. But the missionary in the cities is at present quite generally supposed to be but slightly concerned with what the world of literature and science and statesmanship regards as important and dignifies for its own thought as the problems of the age. His special function is to visit the poor, to distribute tracts, to hold small prayer meetings, to preach to the sodden and the sad from the vantage point of a street corner or in an obscure hall, and once a year at some anniversary in the wealthy districts to tell the benevolent "better class" what they are doing by proxy "to reach the masses." He is in popular thought characterized, physically, by a capacity for living by faith on starvation wages, with the meal always at the bottom of the barrel; mentally, by an intense but narrow conception of the value of the human soul, especially if concealed in a diseased and degraded body under a scant garb of rags; spiritually, by a Christlike but ineffective renunciation of self and trust in God, a self-devotion which barely misses being fanaticism. But that he has a relation to human progress in its broader sweep, at all similar to that of the missionary to foreign lands, has only just begun to dawn upon the world's consciousness.

Beneath the thought of this decade are two postulates. The first declares the supreme importance of the questions of society. The problems of government, of social and economic relations as bearing upon the welfare of the race, are given the right of way in every avenue of thought. The chief concern of humanity is not discovery or science or art, but—humanity. The second postulate asserts that the city is the playground, or, better, the battlefield, of these tremendous social forces. Here they center and combine and contend. It is like history, not repeating itself, but transferring itself into another realm and reproducing Troy and Alexandria, Rome and Paris, in the fierce and far-reaching conflicts of the social world. Where are the problems of society and, specifically, of the city not held to be paramount? In England the semi-socialistic reforms of the London County Council are watched as closely as are Mr. Gladstone's home rule proposals for Ireland. Germany busies herself with plans for workingmen's insurance, and state socialism receives the careful attention of her entertaining and versatile emperor. The most striking feature of our own last census is the transfer of population from the rural to the civic life. Congress appoints a commission to investigate the slums of great cities. The best minds are studying, in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, the difficult problem of municipal government. In thousands of halls each week workingmen are discussing the gravest social questions. The late political campaign was a conflict between economic theories. The most popular lecture rooms in our colleges and universities are those of political economy, history, and sociology. The lengthened calendars of the courts tell constantly the story of new theories and interpretations of the fundamental principles of the laws of property and of personal rights. The press, secular and religious, double-leads its sociological dissertations, and its news columns are a catalogue of the deeds of great cities. A few men—and the world honors them—are mapping the heavens, seeking the frozen secret of the pole, measuring the crust of the earth, and hunting in laboratories the elusive laws of matter; but the age as such has turned its search-light upon the people, and its revealing rays are focused upon the centers where they live and toil and sin and play and weep and die.

Into the city comes the man whom God has sent to preach his Gospel to the people. He finds himself at once in actual contact with the problems which other folk are discussing. With them facts melt into theories, with him theories congeal into facts. Observe the discoveries of his practical life, the realities which confront him in a single day's experience.

1. Here is the rum traffic. It thwarts him at every turn. He is familiar with the drunkard's home. The children whom he gathers into his Sunday school are the heirs of vice. In New York, a block or two from one of our mission churches, is a public school. Within four hundred feet of that school are seventy-seven legalized saloons. Next door to that church is a saloon, in the back yard of which the empty beer kegs on Monday morning are heaped in great piles, and in summer the preaching is accentuated by the stroke of the mallet which taps the barrels. A converted drunkard recently said, that on his way to the mission, which was his spiritual birthplace and to which he nightly goes, he must pass one hundred and sixty dramshops. When the city missionary reads in the laconic phrase of the Bishops' Address concerning the liquor traffic, "It can never be legalized without sin," he knows as few others can the terrible truth of that statement. He is obliged to ponder the physical and moral effects of alcohol, to note the relation of its manufacture and sale to the peace of communities, to the enforcement of law, to the propagation of vice, to the sources of government. The serpent whose sting is in the wine draws its slimy length across the thresholds of the homes this man seeks to brighten, and poisons with its venom the very cup of cold water he would give to the thirsty. Who better than he can study the problem of rum?

2. He confronts poverty everywhere. The hiss of the serpent is no more familiar to him than the growl of the wolf. There is a poverty which is a spur to ambition and impels to better deeds. There is a poverty which means privation, hunger, filth, moral inertia, vice, death. Notwithstanding the constant discussions of the problems of poverty, few understand their horrible import. Professor Böhmert, the Director of the Bureau of Statistics in Saxony, states that over seventy-six per cent of the inhabitants of that kingdom are living on incomes of less than two hundred dollars per annum. A recent authority estimates that in Great Britain thirty thirty-eighths of the population possess in actual property on the average thirty dollars per head, and have an average annual income of eighty-five dollars. Mr. Frederick Harrison said in 1886:

> Ninety per cent of the actual producers of wealth have no home that they can call their own beyond the end of a week; have no bit of soil, or so much as a room that belongs to them; have nothing of value of any kind except as much as will go in a cart; have the precarious chance of weekly wages which barely suffice to keep them in health; are housed for the most part in places that no man thinks fit for his horse; are separated by so narrow a margin from destitution that a month of bad trade, sickness, or unexpected loss brings them face to face with hunger and pauperism.

In London, in 1888, out of 79,099 deaths 17,663 occurred in public institutions. "In the richest city in the world one out of every five persons, or probably one out of every four adults, dies a pauper's death!" The remarkable conclusions of Mr. Charles Booth, based as they are on the most systematic and scientific investigation, show that at the present time in London one person in three is in the thraldom of poverty. "But," it will be said, "there is no such poverty in America." This is true of the country at large. In some cities, however, and in some parts of all large cities on these shores, the poverty varies little from that beyond the sea. In New York, for years, of all who have died one out of every ten has been buried in Potter's Field. Mr. Jacob A. Riis, an expert authority, estimates that "twenty to thirty per cent of our population are always struggling to keep the wolf from the door," and shows "that we have an army of four hundred thousand persons receiving alms in the past ten years, of whom eighty-five per cent may be safely estimated to be still in the slough, or where they may be swamped in it by the first misfortune, idleness, death, or loss of work. The other fifteen per cent worked out of it, died, or moved away." Practical mission workers know that here is no exaggeration. Spread your table with sandwiches and coffee anywhere below Fourteenth Street or on the extreme east or west side, and your room will be filled with guests so gaunt and scarred and famished that your wonder will outrun your pity. It is said that one hundred deaths from starvation were recorded last year. But no record is made of the thousands to whose death hunger was a contributory cause, nor of the scores of thousands who are physically dwarfed and morally debased by the horrible experience of continual semi-starvation.

But hunger is not the only incident of poverty with which the city missionary must deal. The homes he enters are ever emphasizing the crime of overcrowding the poor. In many a parish not only has no family a single house, but very few have a single floor, and the majority live in two or three rooms, of which one at least is never touched by either air or sunlight. It is said that there is one square mile on the lower east side which contains two hundred and twenty-six blocks, where the population exceeds three hundred and fifty thousand, or fifteen hundred and fifty to the average block. One block at least contains nearly five thousand people. Do families from choice share their front door with from fifteen to thirty-one other families? Are parents so dull of wit and hard of heart as to desire for their children the temptation to crime, the contact with vice, the indifference to decency which such conditions of life surely entail? No; a thousand times, no! But poverty, under the grinding necessities of what we proudly or devoutly call our Christian civilization, leaves the multitudes of New York no alternative. And the reality of poverty is central in the work of the missionary to the city. He knows the facts which statisticians tabulate; he faces the foe which political economists describe; he shares the burden philanthropists are striving to weigh and to lift. Who better than he can study the problem of poverty?

3. But rum and poverty do not furnish the only questions which enter into the daily experience of the city missionary. The child scorched with scarlet fever or choked with diphtheria, at whose bedside he kneels, dies and is buried; but the foul abuse of the laws of health declares the necessity of the gospel of sanitation. The scientist who is hunting microbes and experimenting with "lymph" and "cultures" finds no truer ally than the man whose commission drives him into the very centers of contagion. The laws of heredity constantly illustrate themselves before his eyes. He is forced to appreciate racial distinctions. In a cosmopolitan city he must minister to the superstitious Italian, the simple-hearted Scandinavian, the phlegmatic German, the restless Frenchman, the long-suffering Russian. In New York mingle the peoples of the earth in strange confusion. Aryan and Semite shoulder each other on the streets and in the shops. Greek Christian and Romish Christian, Protestant and Jew, trade, argue, sin, vote, laugh, grumble, and sometimes pray together. Here are an Italian city nearly as large as New Haven, a German city surpassed only by Vienna and Berlin, a colored population equal to the number of people in Poughkeepsie, Bohemians enough to occupy Bridgeport. Every third person is a Roman Catholic, and out of every ten one is a Jew. In a large section on the east side one is continually reminded of Evelyn's description of his visit to the Jews' quarter in Rome or of scenes in Daniel Deronda. He reads over the door of a synagogue, "Incorporated 5643 Hungarian Congregation, Bet Hamidrash Hagodol," and over that of a shop, "Budapester Wurst Geschäft," and reflects that the ends of the earth have come hither To reach these varied peoples requires not only the Holy Spirit but the gift of tongues. With their children swarming about his path the problems of education become startlingly important to the thoughtful man. He must form opinions touching the function of the State in the training of citizens. Industrial education, the primary, parish, and public schools must be objects of his solicitude. The relation between the religion he is sent to inculcate and the morality upon which citizenship must rest demands his consideration. In a word, there is no question growing out of the distinction of races, no problem of heredity, no principle of education that does not root itself in the very soil which it is his to cultivate for the great Lord of the vineyard.

4. There is one other phase of current agitation with which none can be more familiar than the city missionary. He is the companion and sometimes the confidant of the workman. He feels the throb of the great and burdened heart of labor. The hall of the socialist who preaches anarchy adjoins the chapel where he preaches Christ. He is accustomed to the red flag. Few so well as he comprehend the meaning of such novels as Murrale Eastman and Metzerott, Shoemaker, and Alton Locke. The contentions of the labor unions, the hopes and miseries of exasperated strikers, and the horrors of the sweating system and child labor are the food of his daily thought. The grievous injustice, sometimes open, sometimes subtle, which flouts in the face the righteousness of the Bible and diminishes to the minimum the possibility of the individual to master life; the barbarism of a competitive system which reduces men to machines and buys and sells their labor as a commodity in the market place; the mockery of law and custom which produces and perpetuates the unnatural inequality of possessions and organizes into social institutions gross infringements of the decalogue—these are the facts which stir his indignation, move his tears, and burden his heart. It is impossible for a man to walk through Mulberry Bend or to fraternize with the denizens of the Fourth Ward without coming to conclusions touching laissez faire and the new political economy. When he looks for the landlord who secures twenty per cent from his wretched tenants, yet never repairs the premises and exposes scores of lives to the perils of defective sanitation, and after most industrious search cannot even find out who the rich rascal is, he is bound to have readjusted views of what is called the sacred right of property. Miss Kate Field, who uses a pen with a sharp nib, says in a recent number of her paper:

> In fact, they [the rich landlords] often fatten on the misery of less fortunate fellow-creatures, as many tenements belong to them, and the rents collected therefrom are so much greater than those collected from high class dwelling houses in proportion to the capital expended as to make them desirable investments. Take New York, for example. I have tried in vain to find out who owned filthy tenements swarming with humanity. The owners are represented by agents who will not divulge the names of their employers. It is the business of these agents to do the dirty work of well-to-do citizens, who no more concern themselves with the welfare of their tenants than they concern themselves with customers buying from them dry goods and groceries. In the latter case customers get their money's worth; in the former they are at the mercy of landlords, and must pay what is asked or be turned into the street.

The landlordism of Ireland creates a national issue and makes and unmakes administrations. The landlordism of our great cities is a menace to the peace of communities, and urges on to its crisis what may easily become revolution if it be not diverted by reform. Certain it is that, whatever opinion concerning personal and property rights a man may hold, there is no such opportunity for applying the logic of facts and testing theory by observation as that offered by a life among the teeming peoples of a great civic center.

If now the position assumed be secure, that the work of city missions is inextricably intermingled with the problems which are throbbing in the heart and brain of humanity, a further truth may be justly urged, namely, that the application of the new forces and methods developed by the very emergency of the case is to be made in the same field and in a large degree by the same hands. How close to the questions involved Providence has placed the solutions! No man yet has seen them all, but some of them are already within reach.

When, fifty years ago, Froebel opened in the German village of Blankenburg the first kindergarten, he little thought what his system would mean to the polyglot myriads of New York's children. Even now few of us appreciate the divine fitness of need and instrument. But, on the basis of the kindergarten, children whose languages vary but whose instincts are one can find the best powers of their minds and the highest uses of their bodies. There are to-day Christian men and women, fast increasing in number, who are giving money, talents, life itself, to the unschooled children of the slums, convinced that the Christian kindergarten will sow seed and develop convictions which can never be destroyed.

To many university extension is the fad of a few educational zealots. The worker in large cities welcomes it as an ally of great power. Every religious center should offer a stimulus to mental life. The so-called lower strata of society are seamed with the precious metals. Workingmen think. The beershop is often chosen, not as an alternative, but because no alternative is offered. The avidity with which the public has grasped the opportunity to hear the excellent lectures provided by the New York School Board during this winter is significant. Instructive exposition of the facts of nature and history and of current thought will find hearers where the people seem most reckless, and many a student whose greasy cap covers an active brain.

And that most humane form of university extension—the college settlement—is in the beginning of a great career. Before a decade has passed among the most useful missionaries in our cities will be many of the brightest scholars of our universities. The course of theological training will be incomplete without months of personal contact with the people. The sociology of the books will be supplemented by that of the life. The great point in reaching men is the point of contact. The convictions which are establishing chairs of social science in every institution of respectable repute are issuing also in the consecration of some of the best students who throng the lecture halls to practical, hand-to-hand efforts for human welfare.

Then, too, there are new orders of Christian service whose characteristics are determined by the demands of our cities. The meaning of such gatherings as the convention of the United Christian Workers in Boston a few months ago is becoming more clear. The development of independent rescue missions, with their splendid corps of lay workers, the revival of the order of deaconesses in the Protestant Episcopal and Methodist Episcopal Churches, the activity of the King's Daughters, of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, of the Christian Endeavor Society, of the Epworth League, and the self-denying service of the Salvation Army are all indications that the Christian Church is responding to a new conviction and is concentrating upon our cities as the strategic points.

The specialization of charity, also, is not only a sign of the sanity of modern philanthropic effort, but is a first concern of city missions. Through no mediation can the facts of need so surely reach the heart of mercy as through that of the wise missionary. Generalized benevolence has had its day; the man who is commissioned to preach the Gospel to the poor is likely to be expected to declare what the poor need.

Many, too, are urging the practical experiment of Christian socialism. The term is obscure and the practice difficult. Yet must we not with a jest or a sneer dismiss the deepening convictions of men everywhere that some reconstruction of the social order is at hand. Less than many other servants of the Church does the city missionary realize the sacred prerogatives of capital and the supreme necessity of preserving the traditional social order. He should not be an alarmist, and surely not an agitator; but more than other Christians he is apt to perceive that God cares as much for the personal rights of each man in the million who have not a bank account as he does for those of each man of the hundred who have. The possibilities of the applied Gospel in curing social iniquities seem to him less distant and the socialism of Christ more reasonable than to many who are following the Master and studying his teachings where the crowds cannot jostle thought or disturb complacence. If any changes are to come in the relative privileges and obligations of men this messenger of the cross will prove an agent of immense influence in shaping human practice to the ideals of the Gospel of Christ. Verily, let the "if" be stricken out. Such changes must come. Says Locke: "Every one ought to have as much property as is necessary for his support." Fichte declares:

> Christianity yet carries in its breast a renovating power of which we have no conception. Hitherto it has only acted upon individuals, and through them on the State indirectly. But whoever can appreciate its power, whether he be a mere believer or an independent thinker, will confess that it is destined some day to become the inner organizing power of the State; and there it will reveal itself to the world in all the depth of its ideas and the full richness of its blessing.

Christianity must accept the challenge thrown down to it by the spirit of this age and become the antagonist of all evils, the protector of all the unfortunate, the avenger of all the wronged. It must wipe out the fine distinction between iniquity and inequity. It must not lag in secular philanthropies nor leave to others the initiation of movements which should have upon them from their inception the imprint of the cross. No organization or order of men on the face of the earth must be permitted to usurp the place of the Church of Christ as the champion of human rights. The pride that despises labor must be crucified. The selfishness which seeks men simply to use them must die. The customs which put the silken glove upon the iron hand of human greed must be abolished. The laws which ennoble riches and degrade manhood are to be abrogated. The wealth which belongs to all must be held for all, and the rights which belong to each must be withheld from none. The rivalry which begets hate and issues in death must be supplanted. The avarice which buys up virtue for gold and makes merchandise of vice must be foiled. Entailed poverty and enforced starvation must be prevented by the community which now barely relieves them. For each soul there must be a living chance in this world and a reasonable opportunity to secure in the world to come "life everlasting." Verily, changes must come, so fundamental and wide-reaching that there will be in the social world a new heaven and a new earth. And let it be repeated with stronger emphasis that, in this process of social transformation, no man can better serve God and humanity than he who stands as the apostle of Jesus amid the surging crowds of our great cities.

If the facts and inferences thus far set forth be conceded they make their own plea. They urge, in the first place, that the ideals of Christian work among the masses be changed, ceasing to be chiefly ecclesiastical and edificatory, and becoming more truly evangelistic and humanitarian. The need of to-day is not the Church of the disciples but the Church of the apostles. The Church must seek men, not wait for them. Its commission should put it, not upon its foundations, but upon its feet. And the object of Christian solicitude should be human need of every kind. To that Church which solves the difficult problem of harmonizing the most intense and spiritual evangelism with the broadest humanitarianism the future belongs. They who are asking what the mission of Methodism is to the twentieth century will find it here.

But the plea goes beyond ideals and asks for men. It requires of the Church, in its press, its administrative officers, its schools, that it influence its best men and women to prepare themselves for this new day. Specialized service means a specialized ministry. If intellect seeks a wide field, if humanity pleads for multiplied opportunity, if culture desires its own highest uses, if the modern spirit demands free play for its formative influence, the adequate domain for all lies waiting where human life, with its baffled but unslain hopes, with its desperate yet immortal needs, lifts and falls, advances and recoils, as with the mighty movement of the storm-swept sea. Just as the pioneers and organizers of opinion have made a beaten track for the hosts who would save the ends of the earth, so also let them reiterate in all the circles of thought and devotion the demand now made by our cities upon the very best ministry of our day. It is too late for untrained zeal to take the world. The unarmored ship is quick to sink under the enemy's fire. If the "undevout astronomer is mad" the unintelligent missionary is his fellow. As the mysteries of the skies yield themselves to no man whose keenest vision is not interpreted by his faith, so the real secrets of humanity are withheld from him whose faith is forced to act through a sightless brain.

Christ's command of the future is conditioned upon his conquest of the cities. That conquest is impossible unless the spirit of the Gospel penetrates into every ideal and institution of human life. That spirit can find access to the multiplied forms it would control only through the contact of hearts that know Christ and understand humanity with the hearts which yearn for both without comprehending either. The first need of this decade is that men and women of culture and godliness, disciplined equally in mind and heart, who can be indifferent to nothing that concerns human welfare, shall with profound devotion to Christ consecrate themselves to the life of contact with the multitudes in our cities over whom the Master weeps. The signs multiply that God is calling many to this glorious service. It behooves the Church to give voice to that inward persuasion. Her faith must inspire, her wisdom direct, the awakened servants of Christ. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord" is no obsolete command. That way is not alone "in the sea," "through the desert," or "upon the mountains;" it runs through "the streets and the lanes" of the city, and as "beautiful" upon the crowded thoroughfares of teeming human life are "the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace," as upon the sacred mountains of the prophet's vision. It is the glad privilege of the Church to hasten the time when the cities of men shall become the cities of God, when the promise to Israel shall have its broader fulfillment, "I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise."

Art. VI.—THE REVIVAL: A SYMPOSIUM.

THE PREPARATION FOR THE REVIVAL.

By preparation for revival I do not mean merely the wise human arrangements which are requisite, but also some great facts, faiths, and convictions which inspire, propel, and secure revivals.

1. The Pastor Must Become the General.—Allowing all due credit to the labors of the laity, and demanding the largest, most incessant cooperation, nevertheless the revival must center in the pastor. It must dominate, inflame, and impel him. It must be as fire shut up in his bones. Then he cannot, will not, rest till his contagious faith and zeal have set others on fire. He must be a walking revival. It will be felt in his grasp of the hand. It will be heard as an undertone in all his conversation as the season for special services draws near, and will break out as hidden fires in all his prayers. His sermons will take shape and intensity from the consuming passion that burns within him. His pastoral visits will breathe a profound solicitude for the unsaved. All this, spontaneously outgoing from the pastor, will be seen and felt. Others will become aroused to a kindred interest. The revival influence is spreading.

Obstacles are seen, but they only stimulate the pastor to more heroic determination. The coldness of many only intensifies his zeal. The doubt of some that a revival is possible challenges his faith to laugh at impossibilities. The indifference of his Laodicean members redoubles his earnestness. His closet echoes with burdened prayers and is sprinkled with scalding tears. He is the center of the courage, real faith, and omnipotent energy of the revival. He must be the leader. As general he must march his forces into the battle and hold them to the contest with unflinching courage and faith. Too strongly cannot be impressed the necessity of the pastor's standing before his people as the informing genius of the revival. Often it will require great pluck and prodigious work to bring a cold, factious, backslidden, amusement-loving church up to the work. But there is nothing else to do. A revival is the stark necessity of such a church. Nothing less will save the day. A revival or death. There is no self-recuperation in such a church. God must come in the power of the Holy Ghost and quicken the dead. Nor must the pastor wait till the whole church is aroused. Aroused himself, aflame with the revival spirit, let him inaugurate special meetings and sound the trumpet. Some will be found to rally to his side. With these begin the battle. Let it be felt that it is no skirmish, but a siege till the enemy surrenders. This is tremendously important. "Hard pounding, hard pounding, sir," said Wellington at Waterloo, "and he who pounds longest wins." Often I have seen the first three weeks utterly discouraging, but persistent pluck has been rewarded with a glorious revival. Once we stayed all night in prayer with a few heroic souls, and within three days the work of God was moving grandly. There must be a strong hand on the helm, and that hand should be the pastor's hand. He must be in the revival spirit if he would have a revival, and stand as the center of its revolving fires.

2. The Deck Cleared for Action.—Naval commanders before a battle clear away all incumbrances on deck. This is necessary to the best service of the men and guns. The pastor must clear his decks preparatory to revival meetings. He must beware that he has no engagements to take him away a single night, and no literary work that absorbs an hour of his time and strength. He must keep himself undivided in interest and devotion. The pastor must allow nothing to divert or divide him in his supreme work. His hand must be steadily on the helm.

Again, he must see that the church is free from distracting influences. Things proper or admissible at other times must be switched on side tracks now, to give the revival the right of way on the main track. Hence, it is important to plan that no entertainments, lectures, concerts, suppers, financial schemes, nor anything else be allowed to distract thought or divide interest during the season set apart for special services. The Christian Endeavor, and Epworth League, and all other week-night meetings must be adjourned for the time. The people must be urged to forego all social visiting and defer all parties during the evenings of the revival meetings. Besides the benefit of the absence of distractions this course calls serious attention to the chief concern of the hour and puts the church in an attitude of expectancy. The interruption of the regular order of things challenges interest in the extraordinary. It sets the members thinking and talking about the revival. This helps the work. Even if some dislike the interruption and get angry, this helps the revival. The devil always makes a mistake when he gets mad. So do cold church members. The reaction comes, and in the meanwhile their anger has agitated interest in the revival. Indifference is more to be dreaded than opposition. Hence, let the pastor clear the decks for the revival as Episcopalians do for Lent.

3. A Revival the Supreme Object.—Until the pastor feels this as a profound conviction there will be no revival, or he must send for an evangelist who has this conviction. For this kind goeth not forth except from men of conviction that this is the supreme work. Mark that I do not say that it is the only work, nor all the work that is important. I know there are many other lines of imperative and indispensable work in the ministry of a well-rounded pastorate. But the conversion of men is so fundamental and imperative that without it there would be no other work to do. This precedes all else, and all else is built upon this. Bishop Foster, in his Centenary Thoughts (page 78), says, "The fundamental work is to build men into God." But men cannot be built into God until they are converted. Hence the supreme work of the pastor is to bring them to Christ.

The pastor must feel that his great business is to save souls if he would have a revival; and to secure their conversion is the only way to save them. Therefore it is his supreme work. Feeling this, he will direct his highest energies to its attainment. He will crib all the waters of his life and pour them on this wheel. This is the emporium toward which all his fleets will sail; this is the capital into which all his treasures of toil are gathered, in which all lines of study terminate, and into which all caravans of rich thought and perfumed acquirements bring their wealth.

The tenth rule for a preacher's conduct, in our Discipline, which every Methodist minister vows he will keep for conscience' sake, declares, "You have nothing to do but to save souls; therefore spend and be spent in this work." Either let us take down that sign or do business under it. Nothing to do but to save souls? Then they must be converted. And the conversion of souls is a revival. I am not arguing for excitements and abuses and shams, but for genuine revivals, wrought by the Holy Ghost and conducted by careful, sober, sane pastors. The majority of Christians in the Methodist Episcopal Church to-day have been converted in revivals. The majority of her bishops and educators and governing minds were converted at her altars in revivals. And the majority of the millions she has fitted and sent to heaven were trophies of revivals. We have always been a revival Church, and when we drop this characteristic we shall lose our Methodist character. Poor friends of Methodism are they who decry revivals.

In his travail of soul for the lost the pastor will come into the fullest sympathy of the mind that was in Christ, and of all the truths that revolve around the cross and its infinite sacrifice. There will be unity, concentration, enthusiasm, and persistence in his ministry. When thus the pastor burns with the conviction that saving souls is his great work, and all his aims, studies, and labors are dominated by this central purpose, he will not need an evangelist. The evangelist is born in him, and the revival is as sure to follow as effect is to follow cause.

4. Conviction that Success is Sure.—On this dictum we are to build. We postulate the help of God as assured. Then we believe that the faithful labors of the pastor and church are sufficient to secure the salvation of souls in individual cases and in manifold conversions or revivals. Often when pastors have the conviction that the conversion of souls is the supreme work of the ministry they lack confidence in the sufficiency of the local church and pastor to accomplish the results, even when the help of God is assured. Desiring, yea, anxious for the glorious work, they turn their eyes from the word of God and the promised power of the Holy Ghost and begin to sweep the horizon in search of some flaming evangelist. This paralyzes any hope of success through their own labors. The pastor discounts the possibility of a revival under his own ministry who turns his thought to extraneous help. Doubting himself, he doubts God through himself. Of course he cannot have a revival. He thinks he cannot. The nerve of victory is cut. His faith is gone, and he will not use the God-ordained means that will promote a revival, because he has no confidence so to do. Or if he makes a feeble, pantomimic use of the best methods, he has no heart, no vim, no faith in the work, and consequently fails. All this time he has been conferring with the church about the work of the Lord, and has communicated to them the idea that if they only had the right kind of an evangelist there would be a revival. His lack of confidence becomes contagious, and the church begins to look for success only in some foreign aid. The faith of both is now dead. They see a land full of Anakim, but do not see the God of Israel who has promised to give them the land by victorious conquest over the giants.

Thus we see how good men paralyze the arm of the Lord. He cannot do many mighty works among them because of their unbelief. Would that I could thrill my brethren with the faith that the pastor and the local church are able, by God's blessing, to secure a genuine revival! Until this conviction is a granite fact in their faith and labors there is little hope of a revival without an evangelist. I speak it reverently, but confidently, that any pastor and local church that will pay the price can have a revival. United in purpose, faith, and hard work along God's lines, they are certain of the times of refreshing.

Why not? I know the reply of many, so often reiterated: "I have no gift or adaptation for this work." Bishop Foster replies: "This kind of remark may have one of several paternities. No doubt in some cases it represents modesty; sometimes it is an affectation of modesty, but more frequently it means simply, 'I have no taste for that kind of work.' . . . But are you sure that you lack this gift of awakening power? Or may you not have unconsciously fallen into one of many snares which the adversary has spread about this point? . . . I cannot doubt that many pass through years of their ministry without seeing any visible effects from one or other of these reasons, rather than because God has withheld from them the requisite gifts. . . . Now what, under the circumstances, is the plain duty of the minister? Can he, therefore, give up the idea of awakening men, and as many of them as possible? Surely not. Such a course would bring the Church to an end. He must simply proceed, with all the power God has given him, in a legitimate and sensible method to warn, entreat, and arouse his hearers to accept the invitation of the Gospel and be saved; and when his awakening appeals have produced their proper effect he must, in every proper way, guide the awakened and penitent soul to his Saviour in the most direct manner possible." He who made Aaron's rod bud and blossom can make all our dull gifts flame with divine power. But, so long as we think we cannot, we cannot.

Let me encourage any troubled young pastor by a word of personal testimony. No one ever began the ministry more diffident, easily embarrassed, trembling from head to foot, afraid to speak to persons and ignorant how to do it, than the writer. I often became so confused that neither the people nor myself could make any sense out of what I was saying. Frequently I was tempted of Satan to feel that I had no call nor adaptation to the work. At last I determined to be a soul-saving pastor by the help of God. It cost me ten years of hard work to get fairly started in understanding some of the methods of success.

There are two distinct agencies engaged in promoting all genuine revivals: the divine agency and the human agency. The divine agency is a constant, invariable power working toward the salvation of men; not arbitrarily, as the old theory of revivals taught, but in coordination with his appointed agents. The human agency is an inconstant, variable power, sometimes working to the same end, and sometimes inactive; working, too, in different degrees of efficiency in different persons. God is unchangeable in love, mercy, and power, without variableness or shadow of turning, yesterday, to-day, and forever the same. And yet he has conditioned the manifestation of his love and power in human agency. The failure to have a constant revival is not in the will of God nor in the law of the Spirit, but in the human conditions. Whenever the human agency meets the divine agency in cooperation there always follows a revival. It may be daily, as in the early Church, or annually, or decennially; but whenever man fulfills the human condition as a coworker God giveth the increase. Hence, it is philosophical and scriptural to labor for a revival at any time. And what intelligent men mean by laboring for a revival is simply to use the means which God has appointed to this end. Then he stands pledged to honor the means. Perpetual revivals are the ideal, but they have never been realized any more than perpetual motion. Theories of both have been propounded, but the actual realization has not been attained. Hence, we are glad to have revivals occasionally or part of the year.

Believing in this philosophy that the divine agency is always ready to cooperate with man, it is reasonable to work for a revival at any time when the pastor and church are willing to come up to the help of the Lord. Luther's epigram is true: "The Lord is a good worker, but loves to be helped." When, therefore, man is prepared to meet God in cooperation a revival is in sight.

These convictions of which I have spoken are fundamental in the preparation for a revival. When the pastor is himself a burning bush of revival; when he clears away distractions and holds all his forces steadily to this one work; when he feels that the salvation of souls is his supreme work and determines to concentrate all powers on its attainment; when he is convinced that the local church and pastor are able to go up and possess the land, and determines to take it; and when faith in God's invariable readiness to save impels pastor and people to do their part in hearty, hard work—then is a revival sure to come. It will come from God as his blessing on the legitimate use of the appointed means. It will not be gotten up, but will come down.

Now, when all things are prepared, strike with conviction that you are ready; strike with conviction that the Gospel of Jesus Christ will conquer; strike with faith in God for his blessing upon your prayerful and persistent efforts. Success is guaranteed in the certainty of God's promise, and in the infallibility of the forces which he wields under his promise to fulfill his will. Only unyielding faith and unfaltering toil on our part are necessary, and God will crown our labors with glorious victory.

J. O. Peck

THE PROSECUTION OF THE REVIVAL.

Assuming that the way for the revival has been thoroughly prepared, the questions arise, "How shall it be successfully prosecuted?" and, "How shall it be conducted so as to secure the largest available results?" In answer to these inquiries let it be said with all possible emphasis:

1. The pastor must keep himself at a white heat of enthusiasm in and devotion to the work. This may be accepted as the paramount condition of success in the prosecution of any revival movement. It will be understood that we speak here of revivals conducted by the pastor without the aid of an evangelist. If an evangelist is to be employed many changes will need to be made in the suggestions contained in this article. But in every revival prosecuted by the pastor, aided only by the local church, the enthusiasm, faith, and devotion of the pastor must ever be the prime and all-important element of success. The revival must inhere in him, spring from him, be the mighty power of which he is the head and center, so far as human instrumentality is concerned. Every revival must have in it a human personality, a center around which its forces rally, a head from which they derive inspiration and courage. That personality should be the pastor. So emphatically should this be true that if he were away from a single service he would be missed. All would feel that something was wrong. He must never be discouraged, but ever full of hope and zeal. No matter how many discouragements he may encounter, they must all be conquered alone before God. In the presence of his people he must ever be the heroic, undaunted, uncompromising leader. He must be deaf to all calls or solicitations to go anywhere or to do anything other than this one work. To all such inducements he must be ready to say with Nehemiah, "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?"

Now, in order to insure and maintain this absorbing interest on his part, several things are necessary. One is, he must spend much time in prayer. Would that the importance of this thought might be impressed deeply upon the mind and heart of every pastor! God challenges us to present our cause before him and to press it to the uttermost. We are assured in his word that he "will be inquired of by the house of Israel;" that if we call upon him he will answer us, and show us great and mighty things, which we knew not; that "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." We learn from the past history of the Church that the men who have been preeminently successful in winning souls have been men of earnest prayer. The walls of John Knox's study were stained with the breath of prayer. Wesley and Whitefield often spent entire nights in prayer. Many of the most successful evangelists of the present day tell us that their mightiest agency and weapon is persevering prayer. O what fervor, what zeal, what power, what hope, what courage, what assurance of ultimate victory come to the soul while wrestling alone with God in prayer. Let the pastor go from his closet to the revival service, and from the revival services to his closet, and marvelous results will follow.

Furthermore, if he is to be kept at a white heat in his work he must give time to meditation. What an aid to prayer is found in this exercise! Christ, before performing his mightiest works, was wont to retire alone into the solitude of some mountain fastness and there spend the entire night in meditation and prayer. It is alone through prayer accompanied by meditation that we can be prepared to do the still greater works which he promised we should perform. Let the pastor meditate upon the character of God, upon his holiness, his purity, his justice and mercy; upon the sinfulness of man, his ingratitude, his rebellion, his moral corruption, his unlikeness to his Maker. Let him meditate upon the shortness of life, the solemnity of death, the certainty of judgment, and the awful issues of eternity. Let him thus meditate until his heart is melted into tenderness before God and his soul overawed in the presence of these mighty themes, and he will be prepared to plead with men to be reconciled unto Jehovah.

Finally, if his enthusiasm and devotion in the work are to be maintained he will need to give himself to reading. First of all, to searching the word of God, especially the life of Christ. Let him read of the Redeemer's wondrous love for sinners, of his infinite compassion for the erring, of his intense yearning over lost men, until his own soul is stirred with a profound longing for the salvation of the sinful around him. Let him also read books upon revivals and aggressive Christian work. Dr. R. W. Dale said to the divinity students at Yale, in his lectures on preaching, "Read every book on preaching that you can buy or borrow." Such has been the practice of the writer for years with reference to the subject of revivals. As a result a large number of volumes bearing specifically upon this topic have been accumulated. Among these are Finney's Lectures on Revivals, Harvey's Manual of Revivals, Porter's Revivals of Religion, Watson's Helps to Revivals, Pierson's Evangelistic Work, Vincent's Revival and After the Revival, Banks's Revival Quiver, Moody's Sermons (3 vols.), Mrs. Booth's Works (3 vols.), Caughey's Revival Miscellanies, and Methodism in Earnest, and numerous magazine and newspaper articles carefully preserved. Now, during a revival, before entering upon the labor of preparation for his evening service, let the pastor take up one of these volumes and read of the methods, trials, and triumphs of other men in the work of winning souls, until his own zeal is quickened and his faith, hope, and courage stimulated. Then in the evening, just before going to his service, after his preparation is all made, let him read for a few moments the burning words of such workers as Finney, Moody, or Mrs. Booth, until his whole being is set on fire with love and enthusiasm for souls, and then go to the church and in tender and tearful accents pour out his heart upon the congregation. Through such means as these the pastor may keep himself at a white heat of enthusiasm and devotion in the work.

2. And this will naturally lead him to earnest evangelistic preaching. By this I mean preaching which bears distinctly upon the work of saving souls. Now, the reason why some pastors are not successful in prosecuting the work of revival is not because they do not desire revivals, nor because they are not consecrated to their calling, but because they do not preach so as to promote a revival. Their preaching is good, in a sense spiritual, and doubtless edifying to believers, but has no direct bearing upon the obligation resting upon Christians to labor for the salvation of men, nor upon the imperative and immediate necessity upon the part of sinners of fleeing from the wrath to come. There is a vast difference between preaching about the Gospel and applying the Gospel to the case in hand. The preaching during a revival, therefore, should partake largely of the hortatory character. One of the most successful soul-winners of the present day never preaches, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, but by exhortation, warning, persuasion, and entreaty seeks to bring the sinner to an immediate decision. He assumes that the unconverted before him have knowledge of Christ and his salvation sufficient to have saved them a thousand times; hence his great aim and effort is to get them to act upon their knowledge and conviction. Such should be the assumption and aim of the pastor in revival work. His preaching, therefore, should be direct, pungent, sympathetic, and persuasive. His themes now should be such as deal directly with sin, repentance, confession, judgment, heaven, and hell. He should become, for the time being, an advocate pleading for an immediate decision. All his powers of mind, heart, and soul should be brought to bear upon the one work of getting the sinner to yield now. Let such be the character of his method and preaching, and souls will be saved and the revival go forward with power.

3. Furthermore, such a condition on the part of the pastor will lead him to inaugurate and maintain continuous services. This is absolutely essential to success in revival work. Some pastors assert that they can have a successful revival without doing this, by simply emphasizing the work of soul-saving in the regular services of the church. But in all such cases investigation will discover that, while the few earnest souls, such as are to be found in every church—those who sustain the class and prayer meetings and are always ready for a revival—are earnestly laboring for the salvation of the lost, the larger part of the membership are entirely submerged in worldliness. If the church, as a body, is to be reached and the community aroused, continuous services must be held. As to the best time for holding such services much will depend upon the environments and conditions of the individual church. In large towns and cities no better time can be found than during the weeks immediately following upon the holidays. The evenings are then long, business is not so pressing, the "week of prayer" calls public attention to sacred things, and the solemnities attaching to the closing of the old and the opening of the new year are helpful in arousing the consciences of men. In these services there should be preaching most of the time. A careful study of the comparative value of preaching and what are known as "revival services" in this work will reveal the fact that, while the latter are helpful to Christians, nothing reaches and moves the unsaved like the faithful preaching of the Gospel. The preaching of the word is the divinely appointed means for saving the world. A good plan is to preach on at least three evenings of the week, having a prayer and testimony meeting on Wednesday and Friday evenings. A meeting of the latter character on Friday evening is of special value, as it affords the converts of the week an opportunity to bear their testimony and gives an impetus to the services of the approaching Sabbath. But it is not wise to have too rigid a plan with regard to the services. Leave a large margin for the promptings and leadings of the Holy Spirit.

The pastor should do most of the preaching during a revival. It is a serious mistake to frequently change the speaker. Many disadvantages arise from such a course. Often the preacher who comes into the service is not at the time in the spirit of revival. This is no reflection upon a minister's honesty and devotion. It is very easy to fall behind the spirit and movement of such a service. In a certain charge in the West one of the most devoted of the official brethren was called away from home during the progress of a great revival in his church. Upon the evening of his return his pastor called upon him to pray. He was much embarrassed, and had but little liberty. At the close of the service he came to his pastor and said, "You know I am willing to do anything I can to help in this work, but after this, when I have been away, please do not ask me to pray until I have caught up with the meeting." Sometimes the visiting brother chooses an unfortunate subject, one not at all in harmony with the occasion. Then through this method curiosity is constantly aroused, criticism is on the alert, and the people are more occupied in determining which of the strange brethren preached the best sermon than in seeking to honor the Holy Ghost. All these unfortunate results may be avoided by the pastor's doing the preaching, if he is physically able for the work. By this means, also, he gains that indescribable something which we, for the want of a better term, call momentum. True, this is hard work, but the saving of souls is hard work—the hardest in the universe. The Son of God was a living testimony to this fact. It was said of him, "His visage was so marred more than any man." The nearest guess at his age made during his earthly life was when the Pharisees said to him, "Thou art not yet fifty years old." He died when he was but thirty-three. When he hung upon the cross the mob cried, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." The same inexorable law applies to you and me in our work; if we would save others we cannot save ourselves.

After the sermon let the altar service follow at once—mark you, not the after service nor the inquiry meeting, but the altar service. Methodism gives up much when she surrenders the old-fashioned altar service. There is something in the warm appeal following immediately upon the sermon without break or interruption—the hushed condition of the audience, the eager expectancy that some one will start, and in the penitent's kneeling with other penitents at the altar, surrounded by an atmosphere of earnest prayer and faith and helped by encouraging words from the pastor and other Christian workers—which mightily assists the unsaved in taking the first step toward the kingdom of heaven, and in finally "getting through" and triumphantly entering into that kingdom. After the altar service let a few moments be given to testimony, endeavoring, if possible, to get any who were saved and all who were seeking to utter a few words of thanksgiving or desire.

4. Finally, such a condition on the part of the pastor will lead him to earnest personal work with the unsaved. Nothing can be more important in the successful prosecution of revival work than hand-to-hand contact with the unconverted; yet this is frequently the very thing we are unwilling to do. Hence, every possible effort is made to substitute something else for it; but this cannot be successfully done. Elisha tried it and failed. When he would raise the dead child to life he sent his servant with his staff with instructions to lay it upon the face of the child. It was done, but the child remained dead, and his staff remained a mere piece of wood. Elisha then went into the room where the dead child lay, shut the door upon them twain, and fell upon his knees and cried mightily to God. He then arose and lay upon the child, putting his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands, until the child was restored to life. The world has had enough of this staff religion, this endeavor to save men at arm's length. What it needs to-day is hand-to-hand contact with its sin and degradation. We need to go to dying men and be eyes to them in their blindness, ears to them in their deafness, mouths to them in their dumbness, light and life to them in their darkness and death. We need to go to them personally, and earnestly and lovingly persuade them to yield to Christ. The greatest results which come to an earnest pastor during a revival come in this way. Let him set apart the afternoon of each day to personal visitation—not so much among the members of his church, except in the case of backslidden ones, but among the unsaved of his congregation, and especially among those whom he has reason to believe are in the least serious. Let him plead and pray with these until opposition is overcome and they yield their wills and hearts to God.

This is the way in which to have victory. There can be no other. There is no royal road to a revival. When we get where John Knox was when he cried, "Give me Scotland, or I die," or where Whitefield was when he exclaimed, "Give me souls, or take away my soul," then shall we see the salvation of our God. Let the pastor not wait for a whole church to get ready for a revival. It never will—it never will. Let him raise the standard, sound the battle-cry, and a few will rally around him. God has in every church "a remnant according to the election of grace." Then let him push the battle and hold on until victory comes. How much this last sentence means! Often the first weeks may seem dark and discouraging. The weather may be bad, the attendance small, the people indifferent, and the devil active and insolent. But let him hold on, pray on, sing on, believe on, trust on, and victory is just as certain as the promise of a faithful God can make it.

William Hart Broddick

AFTER THE REVIVAL.

This title is a misnomer. Had the union of the Church with Christ always remained perfect, and that devotion continued which characterized the early Christians at Jerusalem, there would never have been an "after" to a revival, for souls would have been added daily to the Church. But, since the lesser interests of this life have so absorbed the time and energy of many Christian professors as to make religion appear of secondary importance, revivals have become a necessity, and the leaders in the Church plan for an awakening at certain seasons of the year, with such helps as shall arrest attention, produce conviction, and lead to conversions. Hence, there is a time before, a time of, and a time after the revival; and of this latter period we are asked to speak.

1. There should be a careful survey of the results and a classification of the persons who have become interested in religious things. Some have been truly converted. The world expects of them strength, wisdom, and grace. They need counsel in learning to live in the light. To prepare them for the duties of the Christian life is a labor to which the Church should at once address itself.

But others have been only awakened. This condition of things calls for a very thoughtful and prayerful study of individual cases. The pastor will find that through the earnest solicitations of friends and associates some have been brought in who are still unenlightened with regard to repentance and saving faith. There is no evidence on their part of that death to sin which precedes a life of faith. They may have sincerely asserted their belief in Jesus as the Saviour of men, but it is only an intellectual assent to a fact never questioned by them; they may have given their names for membership and, like Simon, have said, "Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost;" yet there is no evidence that the work of regeneration has been wrought in them. If left in this condition to the ordinary means of grace such souls will either drift away into indifference or attempt to lead a religious life without any change of heart; and, if the latter, their unchanged nature will assert its power and lead them into inconsistencies which bring reproach upon the Church. To avoid this result the most careful attention should therefore be given to those who have thus become interested, but have mistaken conviction for conversion and are still unsaved. They should not be left until they know Jesus as their deliverer from the law of sin and death. So much is involved at this point that it cannot be emphasized too strongly. It should be the first work of pastors and leaders to guide these honest seekers who have been brought to the altars of the Church into the full liberty of the Gospel. Difficult and delicate as the task may be the Church must not fail here.

During this period a prayer and conference meeting should be kept up, in which seekers as well as converts should be urged to state freely their experiences. Luke tells us (Acts iii) that after the greatest of revivals, in which thousands were converted from the traditions of the Jewish Church to faith in the Messiah, Peter and John went up to the temple daily for prayer. And this they continued to do long after the excitement of Pentecost had subsided. The presence of such enlightened souls in these after-revival meetings is of incalculable worth to young converts and will have much to do with shaping their future lives. In such meetings the leaders should emphasize the importance of the witness of the Spirit to what has been accomplished in the soul; and since so much depends upon this sure testimony great care should be observed, lest in the excitement of the revival services the statement of the leader or the wish of the heart may have been taken for the testimony of the Holy Ghost.

2. Attention should be directed to soul growth. Converts are but babes in the household of faith. They are expected to develop and to be prepared for the conflicts and responsibilities of the Christian life. Hence, as soon as the convert gives evidence of genuine conversion he must be taught that soul-culture and expansion constitute the law of his new life. If a bud fail to blossom and send forth its fragrance on the summer air we conclude that some power has hindered its development; unless the babe grow in stature and wisdom we are disappointed, for its power to grow, its capacity to understand, and its ability to do form the measure of our joy. Yet all converts do not grow alike. Some may have had the understanding darkened, the vision blurred, the conscience silenced, and the will vitiated by long years of sin; and these form a class who are sensitive to the criticisms of those looking on, and, therefore, need constant and patient care.

But others, who have never fallen into gross sins, are ready to be led out at once into the larger experiences of the Christian life. The first thing to do with these saved souls is to awaken clear conceptions of what the Father proposes to do for them. Paul, in his prayer for the Ephesians, spoke of these divine provisions as follows: "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places." Under such incentives the convert will come to feel that there are greater heights before him to be gained and greater joys to be secured.

3. Much care should be exercised in the selection of proper literature and other helps for the young convert. In some medical schools more attention is given to the patient's food than to his medicine. Having been saved and cleansed, converts should be instructed with reference to the selection of such soul-food as will maintain a healthy spiritual tone. Their interest should be awakened in God's word. Obeying the command of Him who is the great Head of the Church, they must "search the Scriptures." It is also essential that they become familiar with Church literature, in order that they may be intelligent members of their own denomination, and that they may also exercise that charity which "seeketh not her own" and "is not easily provoked" toward others. It would be well if a course of reading were selected by the leaders, covering the biographies, the histories, and the religious treatises of the universal Church. The church might be thrown open in the evenings and a room appropriately furnished with books and works of art. It would be well if the probationers could listen to a course of lectures on church polity and doctrine, especially on those doctrines peculiar to our denomination. The pastor should also preach on personal con-

...ration and loyalty, when all the membership of the church ...uld be urged to renew their vows. In short, the pastor ...ould constantly be guided in the selection and presentation ...f his subjects by the fact that the convert is before him. He ...ould avoid presenting the theories of philosophers and agnos... since they have a tendency to divert the mind from the ...urce of spiritual nourishment.

4. Christian work should also be urged. Exercise is essen... to growth. It is the price of strength in the spiritual as ... the natural world. The plant in the divine economy must ...ather and assimilate its nourishment, if it strike its roots ...to the flinty soil and stand firm amid the storms. It would ...ver unfold its summer beauty and send forth its fragrance ...nless it had replenished its strength by seeking its own nutri...ent. So is many a professed Christian dwarfed by ease and ...lf-indulgence. Earnestness and activity precede the fruits of ...e Spirit. God has made provision for the weak to become ...ong through the labor of the soul. Next to the sin of unbe...f is that of spiritual indolence. The broken testimony of the ...orking convert proclaims that genuine growth which should ...ppear in every society of Christian men and women The ...nvert should be enlisted with older members of the church in ...ch enterprise as will call forth his personal exertion. When ...ch a condition is carefully observed converts will grow as ...turally as the lily of the field.

Art. VII.—SONGS OF THE CHURCH.

Methodists have always been noted as a singing people. Theirs, indeed, has not been the solemn psalmody of the Calvinists nor the artistic chanting of the Catholics; but it is the outgushing melody of the soul, much, we fancy, like that which Paul recommended as "hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph. v, 19; Col. iii, 16), and perhaps illustrated when the prison at Philippi shook at his and Silas's voices (Acts xvi, 26). The "hymn" which our Lord sang with his disciples before issuing to Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi, 30) is generally thought to have been part of "the Lesser Hallel," which consisted of the Hallelujah Psalms (cxiii–cxviii), and was sung at the daily offering of the lambs on the altar, as well as during the Paschal meal.

The oldest songs of Zion are of course those found in the Hebrew Psalter, and they have therefore formed the basis or at least the model of all later hymns used in the Church of God; but these are so well known that we pass directly to the religious effusions of the Christian era. Undoubtedly the earliest of the latter productions now extant are the three attributed to Clement of Alexandria (head of the Christian school there at the close of the second century), because found attached to his treatise entitled the Tutor (Παιδαγωγός). Of these we select, as the most characteristic and best known, that with the heading "Hymn of the Saviour Christ," which consists substantially of a practical series of epithets designating our Lord's character and offices, in the unrhymed cadence of the primitive Greek meter (irregularly iambic, dactylic, or spondaic dimeter to tetrameter, with the quantity tending to be overborne by the accent); and we present, besides the Greek text, a metrical version as closely following the original as the laws of modern versification allow.*

* It is to be found entire in Daniel's Thesaurus Hymnologus, iii, 1, 2; which follows the edition of Potter. Several translations have been published, all more or less paraphrastic. Our Hymnal gives, under No. 885, five stanzas taken from the version of Rev. H. M. Dexter, D.D., which first appeared in the Congregationalist, December 21, 1849, of which journal he was then editor. It bears so little resemblance to the original in form, meter, phrase, or sentiment that we are at a loss what part of the hymn it is intended to represent. We have supplied in brackets a few words to fill out the meaning or the meter.

O bit of foals [as yet] unreined,
O wing of birds to fly untrained,
O helm of babes to steer [untold],
O shepherd of a royal fold;
Thy simple children gather thou
To praise [thee] holily [as now];
To hymn [thee] guilelessly [we bow]
With harmless mouths [and kneeling low],
The children's leader, Christ, [we show].
O king of saints, all-taming Word
Of highest Father, wisdom's Lord,
Support of toils, the ages' rest,
Of mortals Saviour, Jesus [blest];
O shepherd, husbandman, [and king];
O helm, O bit, O heavenly wing
Of all-bright flock; thou mariner
Of speech-endowed for saving [here]

Of hostile wave, with sweet life's [wish] Enticing. Lead, the shepherd [thou]
Of rational flock; O holy. [now]
Lead, King of unharmed youth,

On-flowing word, age boundless, light
Eternal, fount of pity, right
Who doest, Jesus Christ, the God

Of bride of graces wisely pressed
To tender mouth of infant ward
Through [gracious] nipple of the word,

One of the most noted hymnists of the early Greek Church was Andrew, of Jerusalem or of Crete (A. D. 660–732). We give the original and a metrical version of one of his shorter and most spirited hymns, entitled "At the After-Supper;" that is, the Eucharist (ἀπόδειπνον).

Πρόσεχε οὐρανὲ καὶ λαλήσω,
Καὶ ἀνημνήσω Χριστόν,
Τὸν ἐκ παρθένου σαρκὶ Ἐπιδήσαντα.

Attend, O sky, and hear, O earth,
My praise of Christ your King;
Who came in flesh of virgin's birth,
With mortals sojourning.

Συνέλθωμεν τῷ Χριστῷ,
Πρὸς τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν·
Μυστικῶς μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων
Συναυλισθῶμεν αὐτῷ.

Come, let us join with Christ in prayer
On Olivet's dark side;
Apostles mystically there
With him and us abide.

Ἐννόησον ταπεινή μου καρδία,
Τίς ἡ τοῦ μύλωνος παραβολή,
Ἣν προεῖπε Χριστός,
Καὶ νῆψον λοιπόν.

Observe, my lowly heart, the word
A lesson has for thee:
Two women grinding, said the Lord;
Watch thou accordingly.

Ἑτοίμαζε σεαυτόν, ὦ ψυχή μου,
Ἐπὶ τὴν ἔξοδον·
Ἡ παρουσία ἐγγίζει
Τοῦ δικάστου κριτοῦ.

Make thyself ready, O my soul,
For thy departure too;
The threatened moments nigher roll,
That bring the Judge to view.

The Latin hymns of the mediæval period exhibit that assonance which links them with the modern rhymed productions; and the acknowledged masterpiece of them is the famous Dies Iræ. We have made half a dozen or more versions of this hymn, so difficult to imitate in English, but forbear to add another to the innumerable ones already published.

The most elaborate of all these semi-monkish efforts is that of Saint Bernard, of Morlaix or of Cluny, usually styled "The New Jerusalem," which is of so peculiarly difficult a meter that we attempt but a few of the first stanzas as an illustration.

Hora novissima,
Tempora pessima
Sunt, vigilemus!
Ecce minaciter
Imminet Arbiter
Ille supremus:

Hour while the latest this,
Time now the vilest is;
Let us be waking!
Lo! with great threatening
Imminent reckoning
Soon is God taking:

Imminet, imminet,
Ut mala terminet,
Æqua coronet,
Recta remuneret,
Anxia liberet,
Æthera donet.

Imminent, imminent,
Evils provenient,
Equity crowning;
Rights to remunerate,
Anxious hearts liberate,
Skies to make owning.

Auferat aspera
Duraque pondera
Mentis onustæ;
Sobria muniat,
Improba puniat,
Utraque juste.

May he remove the rough Burdens all hard and tough,
Souls that are bowing;
Sober things fortify,
Wicked things mortify,
Justice both showing.

Ille piissimus,
Ille gravissimus,
Ecce venit Rex:
Surgat homo reus,
Instat Homo Deus,
A Patre Judex.

Once most relenting he,
Now most resenting he,
Lo! comes King rather:
When rises man malign,
Then descends Man Divine,
Judge from his Father.

Coming down the stream of time the volume of sacred song swells into an outburst especially in the hymns of Luther, which so materially advanced the cause of the Reformation in Germany; and his notable "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" has not been altogether displaced from the latest large hymnals. Among English hymn-writers Watts is usually conceded the most conspicuous position, although two recent scholars, eminently qualified by research and impartiality, have unequivocally accorded that rank to Charles Wesley. Be this as it may, Wesley is forever the bard of Methodism; and the revival of true religion which the two brothers effected was very largely promoted by their stirring poetical and eminently evangelical muse.

Our own standard Hymnal, in the improved form issued in 1878, is, we believe, not only one of the very best ever compiled—certainly so for our church purposes—but is in itself a record and monument of the history of hymnology, in our own denomination, at least, for the century of our existence preceding it. We need not here present any detailed analysis or even critique upon it, after the masterly review and interesting particulars furnished by Nutter; but we may be allowed to make a few comparisons, not altogether in the spirit of partisan adulation or self-complacency.

Of the three hundred and twenty-five writers whose names the table of contents exhibits as contributing to our collection, by far the greater number were never members of our own or any other affiliated communion, although naturally the four Wesleys furnished the largest quota—350 hymns (315 by Charles Wesley alone) out of 1,117 in all. But in a truly catholic spirit there also appear hymns by many Calvinistic writers (including 78 hymns by Watts, and seven by the doughty Toplady himself), many by Roman Catholics (among them two hymns by Moore, besides numerous mediæval hymns), and even some by Unitarians or others of doubtful orthodoxy. Prelatical authors (among them Bishops Burgess, Coxe, Doane, Heber, Huntington, Mant, Onderdonk, Wordsworth) have furnished several; and one at least is of a semi-Jewish origin, namely, hymn 103, by Sir Walter Scott, as put into the mouth of a Hebrewess.

The immense importance of hymns, not only to the Church of God in general, but to each denomination and even congregation in particular, as a part of divine service, is illustrated by the popular maxim, "I care little who makes a nation's laws, if I may make their ballads." So one might say that the theology of worshipers is molded quite as much by their hymns as by their sermons. This has been preeminently true of Methodism everywhere. The eminently evangelical, warmly spiritual, and thoroughly practical tone and impulse of their religious songs have imparted and sustained their zeal and animated their labors in public, social, domestic, and private devotion. Many of the effusions of Charles Wesley, Montgomery, and Newton especially are really beautiful and terse expositions of Scripture, and they are saturated with the very gist of the Gospel. Charles Wesley wrote about five thousand hymns. Those published in his collection of Poetical Works fill thirteen volumes, containing nearly six thousand pages. His printed hymn books number forty-six, the first being issued at Charleston, S. C., in 1737, and the next at London in 1738.

The great critic, Dr. Samuel Johnson, who wrote the Lives of the English Poets and himself composed some poems, is credited with the remark that religious poetry, especially hymnic, does not exhibit and probably never can attain a high degree of literary merit. Perhaps this judgment was too largely influenced by his own experience, or else it was exclusively based upon the lyrics, such as Addison's paraphrase of Psalm xix, "The spacious firmament on high," also of Psalm xxiii, "The Lord my pasture shall prepare," together with the original hymn beginning, "When all thy mercies, O my God;" all of which, although correct in sentiment, beautiful in phraseology, and almost faultless in versification, are destitute of spiritual force and fervor. Certain it is that, from the days of Luther to the present, religious movements have been largely indebted for their extent and power to the songs which they have originated. Had Johnson lived to the days of the great revival under the Wesleys he would have changed his opinion on this subject; and the present age, which witnesses the powerful effect of sacred song under Sankey and in the Salvation Army, must admit that, however defective much that is sung may be in point of accuracy of language, refinement of taste, and soundness of theology, it nevertheless has intrinsic merits beyond the jingle of rhyme or the rhapsody of style. John Wesley's statement in the preface to his first hymn book, composed almost exclusively of his brother's verses and his own translations, that there was "no botch work" in it, is not absolutely correct; for it contains many violations of prosody, especially false accentuations. For example, the very first line of the opening hymn (No. 1 in all our recent hymnals) begins with a wrong foot, "O fór a thousand tongues, to sing," and the third stanza, where the real poetry commences, must be incorrectly scanned and sung, "Jesús, the name that charms our fears." There are also some extravagancies in doctrine, such as in our present hymn 1030, where the original reading,

> O would he more of heaven bestow,
> And let the vessels break,
> And let our ransomed spirits go
> To grasp the God we seek,

was justly changed in the revision of 1849, thus:

> O would he more of heaven bestow!
> And when the vessels break,
> Let our triumphant spirits go
> To grasp the God we seek;

but has unfortunately been restored in the later revision.* Nevertheless Wesley's book as a whole was then and still is a vast improvement on the old psalmodies, such as those of Sternhold and Hopkins, and even of Tate and Brady, and exhibits no more frequent nor greater instances of "poetic license" than the versification of Watts and others. Indeed, it contains much less

* It is to be hoped that when a fresh revision of our present Hymnal is undertaken, which ought not to be deferred until the expiration of the copyright compels a renewal of so valuable a monopoly, these and similar blemishes in its versification will be remedied, as they easily may be by a slight change in the violent ones than the average productions of modern hymnists, to say nothing of verse which, under the name of sacred poetry, is written by persons who seem not to know the difference between an iambus and a trochee; for example, the popular lines of Mrs. Adams, Nearér, my God, to thee!

Nearér to thee, which moreover is a purely Unitarian hymn, however pretty its figures and well-turned its allusions, and is wholly destitute of Christian experience. The hymns of Charles Wesley, on the contrary, are full of Christ, and rich in religious depth and spiritual knowledge beyond all those of contemporary writers, not excepting Cowper and Doddridge. Indeed, the almost sole objection which has been adduced against them, namely, their personal character, which has unjustly been attributed to sectarian bias and polemical dogmatism, is one of their principal excellencies; for they are not only a vivid portrayal of the real workings of the heart under divine conviction and grace, and thus a genuine exposition of a sound evangelical theology, but they are often highly felicitous in interweaving, interpreting, and illuminating scriptural truth. Methodists have been taught by their hymn book in the deep things of God and his word not less than by the preaching, eminently practical and revivalistic and edifying as this has proverbially been. The only other hymns that largely partake of this lucid scriptural phraseology, especially the very frequent occurrence of the name Jesus as the first foot of an iambic line. For example, in that beautiful hymn, 604, beginning, which must be sung with the false accent, as we have marked, however accurately it may be read in violation of the meter, the prosody and the grammar would both be greatly improved by simply saying,

"Jesús, and shall it ever be,"

"O Jésus, shall it ever be?
A mortal man ashamed of thee!"

The same thing might with great advantage be done in the third stanza of hymn 1, just noticed, by reading,

"O Jésus, name that charms our fears,"

instead of

"Jesús, the name that charms our fears."

We lay so great stress upon these metrical inaccuracies because lyrical poetry, being designed for and used with music, exhibits every defect of this kind in a much more glaring manner than any other species of verse, and therefore "poetical license" is here less tolerable.

character and earnest experimental tone are those of the other great Arminian poet, James Montgomery, a Moravian, who naturally is in tune with the lofty muse of Methodism. Amid the immense number of Wesley's poems of course some are comparatively feeble, but it is wonderful how generally his flight was sustained. Other hymnists have produced but one or two odes that have attained celebrity, such as Toplady's "Rock of Ages," Heber's "From Greenland's Icy Mountains"—the missionary hymn of all time—and Muhlenberg's "I Would Not Live Alway;" while most or all their other hymns have sunk out of sight through their mediocrity. But Charles Wesley, like his great compeer, Isaac Watts, has achieved not only denominational, but cosmopolitan immortality. As to the relative merits of these two rivals for the laureateship of sacred poesy, we adduce the opinion of experts who cannot be accused of partisanship:

It is difficult to handle a subject of such magnitude and one which has been so little studied and appreciated. "The glorious approach of Methodism" is scarcely yet extinct; the name of Wesley still arouses many old-time prejudices: Calvinists have not quite lost their suspicion of the Arminian teacher, nor Churchmen forgotten to look coldly upon the great schismatic. Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Charles Wesley was the "bard of Methodism;" and most people, without knowing very thoroughly what Methodism is, judge it to be something quite different from other forms of Christianity, and, therefore, conclude that its poet can hardly be the poet of the Church at large. Mr. Creamer, in his Methodist Hymnology, hazards the opinion that the man is not born who should fully appreciate the genius of the Methodist poet. Certainly the day will come when the grateful praise of his own people shall be echoed by the thanks of the whole Christian world; when posterity shall remedy the tardy justice of time, and Charles Wesley be acknowledged as a name great among British poets and facile princeps of modern sacred song. It is because the Methodist poet is not known that he is not appreciated. The more extensively and closely his writings are examined the more will be found in them worthy to be admired and used. Other hymn-writers have had some measure of justice done them. Of Dr. Watts, especially, the name and writings are household words; his psalms and hymns may be found at every bookstall, and very copious extracts from them in every hymn book. But only a few venturesome persons have explored the vast mine of Wesleyan poetry, and its treasures are as yet unclaimed and unused by the Church at large. Dr. Watts has been commonly considered the most voluminous and powerful of hymnists. Many of our readers will be surprised to hear that the published Wesleyan hymns are five times as numerous as his, and that of this immense mass the literary standard is far higher than that of the lesser bulk of the more celebrated writer. Set aside one hundred hymns of Watts's and five hundred of Wesley's best hymns, and there will be no comparison between the remainder in style and poetic merit. Dr. Watts was a poet at certain times and under special inspiration; Charles Wesley was a poet by nature and habit, and almost always wrote as such. Of course his effusions are not all equal among themselves; but he established and observed, through all his multiplicity of verses, a standard which no other hymn-writer up to his time was able to approach, and which none has since surpassed.

The above remarks have an air of special pleading. It may relieve our readers to know that the writer of them is not a Methodist, and simply wishes to see justice rendered. He has had inclination and opportunity to study the Wesleyan poetry as few persons have done, and the conclusions resulting from that study are here expressed.*

The Rev. James King, A.M., an English critic, in a recent work entitled Anglican Hymnology, carefully compares three hundred and twenty-five standard (that is, most frequently occurring) hymns in the principal hymnals of Great Britain, both ancient and modern; and, in his summarized table of one hundred and seventeen principal authors of them, the following result of classification appears (page 306) of the first seven names:

Authors' Names.	First Rank.	Second Rank.	Third Rank.	Total.
C. Wesley	10	8	4	22
Watts	8	7	6	21
Neale	7	4	6	17
Montgomery	4	8	4	16
Heber	7	2	3	12
Tate and Brady	3	4	4	11
Doddridge	4	0	5	9

As our long-time friend, Dr. Erastus Wentworth, that versatile genius, once piquantly put it: "While Watts is dolefully crying,

> 'Could we but climb where Moses stood,
> And view the landscape o'er,
> Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood,
> Should fright us from the shore,'

* Rev. Fred. M. Bird, D.D., in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1864, p. 129. Dr. Bird, when he wrote the above, was pastor of a Presbyterian congregation in Philadelphia. He subsequently became an Episcopalian and professor in Lehigh University, Pa. He was everywhere acknowledged, in this country, if not in the world, to be the highest authority on modern hymnology in general, at least in the English language.

Wesley comes tripping behind him, mounts to the summit, and cheerfully sings:

> 'The promised land, from Pisgah's top,
> I now exult to see:
> My hope is full, O glorious hope!
> Of immortality.'"

Incidentally we may call attention to a fact not generally known, that a convenient Concordance to our latest Hymnal, by William Codville, was published in 1880, and may be had at a moderate expense.

A notable feature and a grand improvement in the latest form of our own Hymnal is the marriage of the musical notes with the hymns themselves on the same or adjoining pages. Similar singing books, issued by Bradbury, Sankey, Tourjée, McCabe, and others, had delightfully revolutionized public opinion as to the utility of this combination. In a general church hymn book for the congregation at large, the task of bringing the words and the tunes for all the hymns on or near the same page was greatly increased; but it has been most happily effected in our own "Hymnal with Tunes." We are glad to see that the example has been followed by the other leading denominations, including even the stately Protestant Episcopal, although in most of these communions private enterprise had to supply the absence of concerted authority, so that there is not as great a degree of uniformity in the books employed as with us. Still later the "Epworth Hymnal," extended even to a second series, has supplied a similar want for our week-evening and occasional services; and Sunday school song books are now almost as profusely abundant as choir singing books. The age of church melody is thus fairly inaugurated, both for old and young; and when the effect of this training upon the taste, the science, and the piety of the Churches has become fully developed we may expect a more complete realization of the ideal songs of the Church universal, preparatory to the grand symphony of the heavenly world, when the song of Moses and the Lamb shall swell its jubilant strains in everlasting joy!

Art. VIII.—"THE DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS."

There are three ways of explaining Haggai ii, 7, and they are represented in the following versions:

1. The common English Version, following the Vulgate, reads: "I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come: and I will fill this house with glory."

2. The Revised Version, following the Septuagint, reads: "I will shake all nations, and the desirable things of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory."

3. A third way of rendering is: "I will shake all the nations, and they shall come to the delight of all the nations, and I will fill this house with glory."

The two principal objections to the first translation are (1) that it can give no sufficient reason for construing the singular noun with the plural verb, and (2) that the context does not favor the introduction of the idea of a personal Messiah, to which this interpretation stands committed. The design of the entire prophecy is to encourage the returned exiles to rebuild the temple. Those of them who saw the house in its former glory felt that the new temple was as nothing in comparison: but they are here assured that in a little time God will again shake heaven and earth and sea, as at the exodus from Egypt, and the latter glory of his temple shall be greater than the former. But the idea of the coming of a person desired by all nations, however glorious in itself such a thought may be, does not appear in the words employed nor in the context in which this verse is set.

Against the second translation, as against the first, lies the objection that it violates good grammar. There is no other instance of the use of חֶמְדָּה in such a collective sense, and if the writer desired to express the plural or collective idea of desirable things why did he not employ the word חֲמוּדוֹת, which plural form, used in just this sense, we find in Ezra viii, 27, and Dan. xi, 38, 43?

But this second translation has in its favor the fact that it accords with the immediate context and with other scriptures which represent the nations as bringing their treasures and desirable things to the house of God. It is much to be pre-to the old personal Messianic interpretation, and is the one adopted by most recent expositors.

We prefer, however, the third view given above, and for the following reasons: 1. It is the most simple and natural translation, and avoids any violation of grammar. 2. It suits the context as well as that which takes חֶמְדָּה in a collective sense, and so saves us the necessity of assuming such a sense for the word here when no other clear instance of such usage occurs. 3. It more accurately accords with the parallel scriptures than any other view.

The word חֶמְדָּה means an object of beauty and delight. Aside from this passage it occurs fifteen times, in twelve of which it is used as an adjective-genitive to qualify another word, as "houses of delight" (Ezek. xxvi, 12), "vessels of beauty" (Jer. xxv, 34), "land of delight" (Zech. vii, 14). In 2 Chron. xxi, 20, Jehoram is said to have departed—that is, died—without חֶמְדָּה, desire, meaning that no one had desire for him to live or delight in his life. In 1 Sam. ix, 20, Samuel says of Saul: "To whom is all the חֶמְדָּה (desire, or delight) of Israel? Is it not to thee?" In Dan. xi, 37, the vile king is said to have no regard for the gods of his fathers, nor the "desire of women." In all these passages Hengstenberg* argues that the meaning of חֶמְדָּה is best expressed by beauty.

In this general sense, considered as an object of beauty and delight, we understand it here in Haggai to refer to the temple of Jehovah in its future glory. This is the main subject of this immediate prophecy (verses 1–9), and it is a Messianic prophecy of the same character as that of Micah iv, 1–5, in which the idea of a personal Messiah is not introduced, but, rather, his glorious kingdom is foretold as a glorification of Jerusalem and its temple. The temple-mountain is to be exalted and all nations flow unto it. The temple, like the Mosaic tabernacle, was a prophetic symbol of the kingdom of God, and we find the completed picture in the closing chapters of the New Testament Apocalypse, where "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple" of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 22). There it is written that "the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it."

* Christology, vol. iii, pp. 250, 251.

What sort of "glory" did the Spirit which was in Haggai contemplate when he said, "I will fill this house with glory?" Those who follow the Septuagint and the Anglico-American Revision are mainly influenced by what immediately follows in verses 8 and 9: "Mine is the silver, and mine is the gold, saith Jehovah of hosts. Greater shall be the latter glory of this house than the former, saith Jehovah of hosts; and in this place will I give peace." This mention of the silver and gold, it is said, requires us to think not so much of the coming of the nations as of their precious and desirable things, such as would bring glory to Jerusalem and the temple. But this is precisely the question to be determined. Which was uppermost in the mind of the prophet, the nations or their treasures?

We will not reach a satisfactory solution of this question so long as we assume that one of these ideas excludes the other. Can we suppose the coming of the costliest gifts of the Gentiles, while they themselves remained far away? Or can we think of the coming of the Gentiles without their precious things? The most obvious thought is that, so far as the latter glory of the house was to be enhanced by things like these, it would be seen in the coming of the nations with their treasures, and not in the coming or sending of the treasures only.

So long, therefore, as both ideas demand recognition in the exposition we turn to parallel scriptures, to observe how these two conceptions are combined and which one seems to have the greater prominence. Zechariah, a contemporary of Haggai, prophesying a few months later, speaks also of the future building of Jehovah's house, and says of the Gentiles: "They that are afar off shall come and build in the temple of Jehovah" (vi, 15). These post-exilian writers were familiar with "the former prophets" (Zech. i, 4), and we may well appeal to them for light on the meaning of such language touching the future of Jerusalem and its temple.

Notice, first, the language of Micah (iv, 1, 2) in the passage already referred to: "It shall come to pass in the end of the days that the mountain of Jehovah's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, . . . and peoples shall flow unto it. And many nations shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of Jehovah, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in paths: for out of Zion shall go forth law, and the word of Jehovah from Jerusalem." The same appears also in Isa. ii, 2, 3. The passage which is most closely parallel in its main thought, and so elaborated as to give the fullest idea of both the coming of nations and the bringing of gifts, is the sixtieth chapter of Isaiah. The future glory of Zion is there foretold as a newly risen "glory of Jehovah." "Nations shall walk to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." Exiles are gathered home again, and then it is said (verse 5): "The abundance of the sea shall be turned unto thee, and the wealth of the nations shall come unto thee." Then multitudes of camels from Midian and Sheba and flocks of Kedar shall come up and help to "beautify the beautiful house" of Jehovah (verse 7). Further on it is said that the gates will be open night and day continually, that men may bring therein the wealth of the nations, "and their kings led along" (verse 11). "The glory of Lebanon shall come," and other precious kinds of wood, "to beautify the place of my sanctuary, and the place of my feet I will make glorious" (verse 13).

Here it is unquestionable that the precious things of the nations are made very prominent as helping to beautify and glorify the place of Jehovah's sanctuary; and, so far as this chapter of Isaiah helps to the interpretation of Haggai, it cannot be denied that the coming of "the choice things of the nations" to beautify and add to the glory of Jehovah's house was altogether relevant and had been made familiar by the older prophet. But here, again, it must not be overlooked that the same scriptnre opens that picture of beauty by saying of Zion, "Thy light has come, and the glory of Jehovah has risen over thee, . . . and the nations shall walk to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." All the descriptions that follow are associate ideas of this ruling thought, and the climax is reached when it is said at last, "Jehovah shall be unto thee for an eternal light, and thy God for thy glory" (verse 19). It is this light and glory of Jehovah which attract the nations hither, and they come bringing their gifts with them. This thought is intensified by the passage in Isa. lxv, 17, 18: "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth. . . . Be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people gladness." This very passage seems to have influenced Haggai when he wrote, "I am about to shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all the nations, and they shall come to the delight of all the nations." In Haggai the delight (חֶמְדָּה) of the nations is the same as that which Isaiah calls a joy and a gladness (גִּילָה and מָשׂוֹשׂ). It is the place where, according to verse 9, Jehovah "will give peace." It is the glorified Zion, of which Jehovah is himself the temple, and in whose light the nations walk.

We should not fail to notice, further, that this passage of Haggai is quoted in the Epistle to the Hebrews (xii, 26), and there explained as the shaking and removal of things which give place to "a kingdom that cannot be shaken." That kingdom is seen in the immediate context to be "Mount Zion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem," to which all true followers of "Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant," are supposed to have come (verses 22–24). How all this accords with Isaiah's conception of the "ransomed of Jehovah," who "shall return and come to Zion with singing, and with eternal joy upon their heads" (Isa. xxxv, 10), is obvious. This glorious and beautiful Zion, then, would seem to be the חֶמְדָּה, object of delight and desire, in Hag. ii, 7, to which the nations come and bring their gifts. The silver and the gold belong to Jehovah, and the coming of all nations to the place of his sanctuary was assurance that nothing of this kind would be wanting in that day. The context sufficiently implies that the coming of the nations involved the bringing of their gifts. But it is not, in fact, the bringing of silver and gold which constitutes the glory of Jehovah's house, but rather the conversion of the nations which walk by the light of it.

We conclude that חֶמְדָּה is best construed as an accusative of place after verbs of motion, precisely as Zion is after the same verb in Isa. xxxv, 10. This interpretation has been shown to fit the context as well as any other, and to present more clearly the import of parallel scriptures. And this explanation is the only one in complete harmony with the syntax of the language.

EDITORIAL NOTES AND DISCUSSIONS.

OPINION.

The Christian Church bears an exceptional place among all human institutions. By its divine origin, its high standards for admission, its terms for continuance in membership, its world-wide purpose of evangelization, and its sublime plans for the glorification of the race, it is differentiated from all other organizations of the earth. The sphere and functions of the Church cannot, as a consequence, be too sacredly guarded. Forgetfulness thereof or willful indifference to the supreme purpose of Christian association has led in the past to the pernicious union of Church and State, from which alliance only evil has come to the civil interests and spiritual leanness to the body of Christ. The Church should not, cannot forego the enunciation of great principles whose application belongs to the sphere of government; but to mount the throne and to wield the rod of temporal authority is a violation of God's purposes for his organization which can only bring disaster. Similarly, the Church does not exist for the primary object of scientific discovery, of æsthetic development, or even of advance in secular education. As worthy as these objects are, they are subordinate to the main reason for the erection of the Church in the world. While the Christian organization is to a proper degree the patron of all the arts and sciences and gives to them all her paternal oversight, yet the lesser purposes to which we have alluded may be largely subserved by the many scientific societies and educational institutes with which the world is filled. The Church exists for a sublimer purpose. The maintenance of holiness in the hearts of believers and the spread of holiness throughout all the kingdoms of the earth are the object of her creation. Definite is the showing of the apostle that Christ died for the Church that he might "present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." It has, therefore, well been said that the Church is not herself Christianity. She rather presupposes it; she is the concrete embodiment of the principles of the Gospel; and, by the Protestant view, she is an empty and worthless organization unless the Lord dwell within his temple. "The Christian Church," pertinently says Gieseler, "is a religious-moral society, connected together by a common faith in Christ, and which seeks to represent in its united life the kingdom of God announced by Christ." The advance of righteousness is, therefore, the one work of the Christian Church in the world. She does not pose as the director of all mundane affairs and the regulator of every form of secular advance; thus to vaunt herself would be to become the subject of just rebuke. But as a teacher of righteousness there is none other so influential—there is none that in the comparison merits the name of a teacher of holy things. Her sphere is undisputed. In the utterance of her message she has a claim upon the car[illegible] all men; in the promulgation of her doctrine she has the right to kn[illegible] at the heart door of every member of the human family and demand [illegible] surrender to the divine claims. In proportion as she performs this w[illegible] does she meet the approval of the spiritual forces that bend over th[illegible] wicked world. By this standard of success alone are the Greek, Roma[illegible] and Protestant Churches, with their many ramifications, to be estimat[illegible]

THE phrase "applied Christianity" is a term whose rhythm and relative newness are destined to give it currency in religious circles. Like other new expressions, which are coined to indicate the measure of Christian duty in relation to one's fellows, its very unusualness would for the moment seem to embody a radical remedy for human inequalities and ills. The phrase, however, is far more modern than the spirit of self-sacrifice and service for others which it signifies. When in the history of vital Christianity has it been aught else than an "applied" Christianity? Early in the New Testament days began that practical regard for the needs of men and that endeavor to rectify existing injustice and inhumanity which is the glory of the Gospel system. After the multiplication of the disciples, following the day of Pentecost, the Grecian widows were found to be neglected in the daily distribution of food; whereupon seven men, among whom was the holy Stephen, were chosen and ordained to remedy this neglect. What else was such service than "applied" Christianity? The larger fact of duty toward suffering humanity in general was also soon inculcated. The immortal epitaph of the Book of Acts to the memory of Dorcas is that she was "full of good works and almsdeeds which she did." Her finished needlework was shown to Peter when he came to her bereaved home. What else was the philanthropy of Dorcas—giving name, as she has done, to so many modern organizations for the relief of the poor—than Christianity "applied?" So the all-important lesson of the brotherhood of believers was early set forth. Onesimus had been a slave; yet Paul terms him "a faithful and beloved brother," and sends, as one of the bearers of the letter to the Colossian Church, the man who had worn the chains of servitude. What else was such an early illustration of the great law of brotherhood than the application of Christianity to human relations? The case has not been different in later centuries. The benevolent service which has been the noblest for eighteen hundred years, and which has made melody in human hearts amid the discord of men's jarring passions, has had a Gospel origin. True Christianity has never ceased to apply the balm of the Gospel to the aching wounds of the world. Even in the obscure ages of Christian faith, could the veil be lifted, we might discover such an operation of true Christian philanthropy and such a widespread enjoyment of its benefits as we hardly dare to dream. It is not true, therefore, that Christianity has but lately begun to be "applied" to the solution of the complex social problems that press upon the age for settlement. If the term be used in any disposition to a covert reflection upon the good intention or the successful performance of gressious Christianity we must challenge its use. But if it be employed in a spirit of compliment to the past and in the disposition to emulate the former good deeds of the Church, it is the new and happy expression of a profound truth. Certain it is that Christianity must be "applied." It has shown no other efficacious medicine for human ills. The Gospel is the greatest need of the ages and of the world.

Man is a creature of vast responsibility under the moral law. The Scriptures so explicity and repeatedly state the fact of human stewardship that to deny the relation is to challenge the truthfulness of the inspired book. No man in mortal history has ever lived to himself alone. "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." Clothed with rare solemnity, therefore, is every human action, and fraught with unspeakable consequences is the judgment-test through which mankind must pass. But what is the measure of individual responsibility under the moral law? The inquiry leads at once into one of the most fascinating departments of discussion, yet into a field which must be trodden prayerfully and with reverence. And, first, the fact of environment, it would seem, should be a condition of judgment. Circumstances in part make the individual. To be born in the tenement-house districts of one of our great cities, where the very air is noxious, and where all the surroundings are those of squalor, depression, and wickedness, is to enter into life so hampered at the outset that only a herculean soul can struggle out from the slavery of such associations. If a few, through an innate desire for better things and the supporting grace of God, have found enfranchisement, the great majority have consented to their surroundings with passive, careless, hopeless acquiescence, and have yielded themselves as the instruments of evil. Or, to come into the world amid the wholesome surroundings of a Christian home — with the beauties of nature and art to minister to the æsthetic tastes, and the elevating influences of right example in full operation—is to receive advantages from fortune. For those so born the battle with unrighteousness is half won. The drift is toward the right. Only by a quarrel with his better instincts, and a violent separation of himself from the friends of the good, may such a man turn to the evil. We would not declare that the fact of poor environment will be reckoned as an absolute excuse in the case of "the great assize;" yet, on grounds of equity, it will perhaps be a reason for the partial apology of human error. Nor will the fact of good environment redound to personal credit unless there has been a diligent use of the great privileges given, and large accomplishments as the result of the consecration of one's talent to God's use. But another truth which enters into human living is that of heredity. No law is more potent. Science has long since shown the transmission not only of intellectual traits, but of moral qualities. Our predecessors live again, as it were, in us. The olden passion that lights the cheek, the disposition to theft, the inherited love for intoxicants that curses the wanderer to-day, lay like a curse upon some ancestor. Such inheritance of evil qualities, leaping over intervening generations and showing forth in the life of some remote descendant, is not a trivial consideration. Though ancestral traits may not be a sufficient excuse for sins of free and conscious commission, yet they must be an influential factor in the summing up of moral performance. If, then, environment and heredity, to say nothing of other influences, be in the divine judgment just grounds for extenuation, how weighty a responsibility devolves on those who are well born! For such each action, each word, each intent must be weighed in the impartial balances of the divine estimate. And happy he who passes through the solemn test, that he may inherit the eternal riches.

With the recent rescue of several early Christian manuscripts from the dust of the centuries the whole Church is intimately concerned. Three of these ancient writings have been brought to the notice of current scholarship through the critical care of Professor Harnach, of Berlin, and are known as (1) "The Revelation of St. Peter;" (2) "The Gospel of St. Peter;" and (3) Fragments of the "Book of St. Enoch." Another of these important manuscripts, from the public library of Laon and bearing the date of the thirteenth century, contains the Latin text of St. Paul's correspondence with the Corinthians, called also the Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. To the painstaking of Dr. Bradke, of Bonn, the publication of this epistle with critical notes in the Theologische Literaturzeitung is to be credited. In no instance are the contents of these time-marked manuscripts of trifling value. The fact that the "Gospel of St. Peter" is an heretical book and represents the theories of the Docetæ brings us into closer relations with this ancient sect and verifies their denial of Christ's human body and consequent physical sufferings. If they were before, they are no longer a vague, half-tangible group of early disciples, but, as eager interpreters of the mysteries of the hypostatic union, stand forth in their startling personality. As a document of the eighth century, though fragmentary and heretical, the manuscript further shows the use of the four accepted gospels at the earliest periods. Negative criticism thus receives another death wound; the writings of the evangelists have cheered the souls and buoyed the faith of practically the whole Church since the first disciples who "saw the Lord" went heavenward. Nor can progressive scholarship have aught but cordial welcome for the newly found correspondence of Paul with the Corinthians. It is not clear at this writing that the text of this new document varies from the Latin copy already extant, which was previously discovered by Berger at Milan. Yet, granting their coincidence, if there is contained in them any suggestion which prompts a new study of the personality of the greatest of the apostles, or a new inquiry into the events of those formative times, the purpose of the Latin texts will have been accomplished. All resurrected manuscripts must have their mission. Even if spurious, they are not valueless; if authentic, they are indestructible links connecting the present Church with that nascent organization over whose origin the great apostles and the greater Christ presided.

DAYBREAK has come in India! The third Decennial Conference of her missionary workers, which opened on December 29 in Bombay, has proved one of the most inspiring conventions in the recent history of Christendom. Like men who lay aside the sword for a moment's respite while the battle still wages, did these missionary laborers of different denominational ranks gather in the great council of war. Their godly judgment as to the future management of the work, based upon long years of experience, their spirit of rejoicing as they witness the ingathering of the glorious harvest, and their disposition of true fraternity in the further prosecution of the common cause are surface facts in the story of the Decennial Conference. But a deeper truth engrosses our present notice—the marvelous opportunity which opens for Christianity in India. The Gospel, let it be said, does not advance by methods altogether unusual. Like other systems of philosophy or religion, its progress turns on a twofold condition, the zeal of propagandists and, no less, the receptivity of the nation to which the truth is brought. Forbidden to carry the sword for forcible conquest, and preaching, moreover, a faith whose foundation assumption is the free assent of the human heart to its demands, Christianity must have an open field for its largest successes. While it has never feared the dungeon, the rack, or the fires of martyrdom, it is, nevertheless, susceptible to outward conditions, like purely human systems. But what larger opportunity could the Gospel ask in India? Never before has such a sight been seen since the majestic events of Pentecost. The day of hostility to the new faith which came to India over the Western seas has forever gone by; the time of mere indifference has passed; and the call for the Gospel has become an importunate cry—the cry of millions who have proved the emptiness of all heathen worship. Without forgetting the Macedonian calls which come with new force from Japan and China—yea, from all mission fields of the earth—the present stir in India is a spectacle for the angels! But the very confession of submission on the part of the worn-out systems of Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Brahmanism, in India, puts a new burden on the one true faith. Its opportunity is its emergency. Never since the apostles mapped out their early campaigns and called for Christian helpers has the demand for volunteers been more imperative. The need of Augustine for assistants on his missionary journey to England, the need of Wesley for evangelists in the days of his holy reform, was not greater. Workers for the English-speaking classes, translators of Christian literature into the tongues of India, medical and general missionaries, can find more work in that tropic country than they may do. Western Christianity cannot deal with India in any paltry and temporizing way. This great country of the Orient demands great care, great sacrifices, great gifts. Not yet can autonomy be given to her native Church. The care of her two hundred and eighty-four millions of needy and inquiring souls is the measure of our Christian responsibility.

CURRENT DISCUSSIONS.

AN EDITORIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

As is already known to the readers of the Methodist Review, a vacancy has existed in its chief editorship since June 18, 1892, when Dr. J. W. Mendenhall, but recently reelected by the General Conference to the management of the periodical, passed to his reward. It is our pleasure now to announce the filling of this editorial vacancy by the Book Committee, at its annual session in Chicago. On Febuary 8, 1893, at the meeting of this supervisory body, the Rev. William V. Kelley, D.D., of the New York East Conference, was chosen editor of the Review. It is but justice to the new official and his plans for the periodical, as well as in harmony with his desires, to state that his sense of obligation to the First Church, New Haven, Conn., which he is now serving as pastor, leads him to continue his relations to that church until the annual session of the New York East Conference, in April. The maintenance of this pastoral relation on the part of Dr. Kelley will preclude the performance of any editorial work by him until the preparation of the May number of the Review.

DOGMA AND LIFE; OR, THE RELATION OF BELIEF TO CONDUCT.

ABOUT fifteen years ago a group of working pastors was asked by a professor in theology what books of sermons they found most helpful, and the answer finally agreed upon was Bushnell's and Robertson's. If a similar group of pastors were asked to-day to name the two leading preachers of Protestant Christianity—the preachers attracting the most attention and standing as the best representatives of the all-conquering Gospel of Jesus Christ—it is probable that the vote of a majority would select the versatile, broad-hearted, and fearless Archdeacon Farrar, of London, and the great Phillips Brooks, of Boston, the shadow of whose untimely death, as these pages are written, lies deep upon the world. But the names of both these eminent ministers are associated in the public mind with broad views on theology. They are known as apostles of the spirituality of Christianity, rather than of its dogmatic faith, and if we estimated them merely by the utterances in the periodical press, without a study of their lives and writings, we would almost conclude that they had small distinctive beliefs concerning God and his relation to men. But nothing could be farther from the truth than such a conclusion. On the contrary, they are known as men of intense convictions concerning Christian dogma. To them God is the starting-point of all rational thinking, and Jesus Christ is its end; and apart from Jesus Christ they have no hope for individual or associated humanity. Their attitude is accurately expressed in the following quotation from Phillips Brooks: "Before the young Christian lie the doctrines of his faith—God's being, God's care, Christ's incarnation, Christ's atonement, immortality. The mature Christian holds these truths no longer crudely, as things to be believed merely, he has taken them home into his nature; he has transmuted them into forms of life."

This leads us up to a question that is in the air to-day, the question of the relation of dogma to life, the dependence of conduct and character upon beliefs of the understanding. An effort is making in our time to divorce religion from the understanding and to make it purely a matter of feeling. Religion, we are told, is a feeling, a sentiment; and when we go further and wed it to distinct concepts and beliefs of the mind we go astray. In his Rationalism Mr. Lecky says, "Christianity was in the beginning strictly a religion; that is to say, it consisted of modes of emotion, and not of intellectual propositions." Matthew Arnold tells us that "religion is morality touched with emotion." The master in this insidious crusade against the dogmatic element in Christianity is the great writer whom we have just quoted, Matthew Arnold. He has a high appreciation of Christianity as an agency of culture, and tells us that it is the greatest and happiest stroke ever yet made for human perfection, and that "at the present moment two things about the Christian religion must surely be clear to anybody with eyes in his head. One is that men cannot do without it; the other, that they cannot do with it as it is." The change which he urges, and which he has advocated in two volumes of remarkable power, is to strip Christianity of its "preternaturalism." Mr. Arnold was an agnostic. His philosophy was a product of the material and moral evolutionists, with a strong flavoring of pantheism. God is the "eternal not-ourselves which makes for righteousness." He rejected the personality of God because it cannot, as he said, be "verified." "The assumption with which all the Churches and sects set out, that there is a great personal first cause, the moral and intelligent governor of the universe, and that from him the Bible derives its authority, can never be verified." He is very severe upon all who take the Bible "literally," and thereby reach a faith in God, in miracles, in the supernatural. The Bible is literature, it is poetry, eloquence, religious idealism; and all who take it as setting forth objective truth are "wanting in intellectual seriousness." The impudence of that last touch approaches the sublime. And must we not return upon himself the charge of intellectual insincerity in his use of the term "verify," in the above quotation about God? He uses it as would a mathematician or scientist in the sense of demonstration, knowing well that no theist ever claimed that the being of a personal God is capable of this style of proof. But strip the term "verify" of that peculiar sense, and how weak his words become! One would like to ask him whether the uniformity of nature's laws can be verified; whether the universal ether as the physical basis of light can be verified; or whether he can convince by any process of verification a person of corrupt heart that "sweetness and light," his own ideal of character, are the bounden duty of every man.

Very few of the rational beliefs and convictions of men are matters of demonstration. That whole realm which passes before the mind when we quote the phrase, "the true, the beautiful, and the good," is quite beyond the instruments of the scientist; but it is none the less a part, and a very important part, of the life of mankind. Is it not enough that the denial of an intelligent Creator and of personal immortality puts us, as John Fiske has shown, "to permanent intellectual confusion?" When that wonderful old Greek, Heraclitus, said that "religion was a disease, though a noble disease," his thoughts were on the paganism about him; he himself, like the supreme spirits of all ages, believed in a spiritual God who made the universe. And that other Greek, Plato, perhaps the greatest of all thinking men, has expressed beyond any writer besides in the department of religion or of philosophy those desires and hopes of mankind which clamor for satisfaction in distinct religious beliefs. "There has been," says Mulford, in The Republic of God, "in no religion so full an expression of the hopes and desires of men which prefigure the revelation of God as in Plato."

The Master Word of the Bible.

There is one chord that stretches across every page of the Bible, both in the Old and in the New Testament, and that chord is righteousness. Its note is distinct and loud: "He that doeth righteousness is righteous." No incantation or priestly charm may be made a substitute for it. "Keep ye judgment, and do righteousness." "Cease to do evil; learn to do well." Faith is not more a corner stone in the New Testament than righteousness. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal. . . . Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." But this fact is not so notable as another, namely, that the Bible indissolubly weds righteousness to religion, and is such a revelation of God as kindles a keen sense of sin in the hearts of sinful men and secures practical goodness. The ethical teachings of the Bible are not peculiar to it, and it may even be said that they are not superior to the ethical conceptions of many philosophers and religious teachers; but the method of transmuting ethical ideas to conduct and life—which Jeremy Taylor called in his quaint phrase "the excellent plot of the Gospel"—is peculiar to the Bible, and an experience running through nineteen centuries proves that it is the most effective method the world has ever known. That method includes a heart-belief in certain doctrines concerning God's being and love, Christ's incarnation and sacrifice, regeneration by the Holy Ghost, and everlasting life after death. It was the habit of paganism to divorce morality from religion so that it was enough if only the ceremonial were duly observed; and the modern apostle of ethical culture preaches that the coming man will be "a saint without religion." On the other hand, while the Bible distinctly aims at an ideal manhood which includes freedom, righteousness, and love, it declares with equal clearness that man has never been able to attain this without divine help, and that he may attain it through the Gospel of Jesus Christ. That emancipation of spirit, joy in life, and "complete living" (to use Herbert Spencer's phrase) which have been the dream of the wise in all ages are secured through Jesus Christ. There is something deeply pathetic in that cry of Cebes about death in the Phædo, "But where, O Socrates, shall we find a potent charmer?" It recalls a similar wail in the exquisite invocation of Renan in the Life of Jesus to "the pure spirit" of his departed sister, "Reveal to me, O my good genius, to me whom you love, those truths which master death, prevent us from fearing, and make us almost love it." Cebes in the ancient world and Renan in the modern world of to-day, each adorned with the highest culture of his time, seeking a charmer who shall prevent us from fearing death! To this supplication the Christian hears a response: "I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;" and he recalls the words of an aged missionary at the end of an heroic life, "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better."

Cardinal Doctrines are Few.

But it should not be forgotten that the doctrines that are fundamental in the Christian scheme are comparatively few. There is a shifting movement in theology, as in all other sciences, and it were well if the leaders of Christian opinion could keep in mind the old aphorism, "In essentials unity, in nonessentials liberty, in all things charity." In the history of revealed religion it is not difficult to trace a nucleus of truth which has been permanent through all dispensations, and also to note the mutations of the fringes that form the corona of the solid body of truth. The Church has possibly overestimated the number of the things that are essential. It may also be said that she has perhaps overestimated the mischief wrought by errors and heresies. It is the sincerity and steadiness of faith as well as its quantity that is important. The nucleus may be a short creed, but if it is held honestly in loyalty and love of the truth it will build up heroes and saints, Churches and empires. The essential thing is a great grasp of the soul on the eternal God. "I believe" is a "cry of war," as Victor Hugo said—un cri de guerre. How brief was the creed of the Hebrew prophets and psalmists! and yet it produced the grandest ethical literature of history, and fostered aspirations which could only be satisfied by the doctrine of the servant who should bear "the sin of many" and make "intercession for the transgressors." How grievous were the errors of Calvinism as held by the Reformed Churches of the Continent and as entertained by Puritanism everywhere! and yet the Calvinism of Protestant Christianity did not hinder the birth of great Churches, strong States, and the purest civic communities that the world has ever known. Bishop Foster, in one of his sermons, has put these things with his accustomed vigor: "We are safe in saying that up to date there is no perfect creed, we even doubt that there ever will be. . . . The attitude of the Church must ever be that of a teacher and that of a learner."

THINGS THAT CANNOT BE SHAKEN.

But if it be true that every great epoch in human progress is an epoch of expansion, with new horizons, and "signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made," it is only that those "things that cannot be shaken" may come into clearer view. Some things have been made clear by the past. History proves that man is not only a mathematical being gifted with a genius for numbers, but also that he is a religious being. It proves that religion is a world-force as ubiquitous as atmosphere and as constant as gravitation, and that, like fire or electricity, it is something to be regulated, not to be abused or ignored, for the destructive forces of hell or the benign forces of heaven are in it according as it is related to truth. It may with equal confidence be claimed that an honestly cherished faith is the test of a rising or falling civilization. Religion has stood by the cradle of every nation and philosophy by its grave. Find a nation on the upward grade, and you will find one in which the religious life is sincere and where a living faith gives sacredness to the home and to personal life; find the same nation in its decadence, and, although the arts, literature, and philosophy may flourish, religion will be found to have lost its hold upon men. There was a time in Nineveh when the king might not ride in his chariot through the streets of his capital on the day of rest. There was a time in Rome when an assault upon a virgin "struck the dateless doom of kings" and led to the republic; and there was a later time when Rome's greatest philosopher, Lucretius, in utter despair of all things, nerved himself to suicide by recalling the immolation of his early kinswoman, whose deed of piety he could not comprehend.

In "Lucretius," that magnificent poem of the late laureate, Tennyson has sketched the outcome of the philosophy which regards this universe as a "fortuitous concourse of atoms" and which finds no place for duty:

> With that he drove the knife into his side;
> She heard him raging, heard him fall, ran in,
> Cried out as having failed in duty to him.
> . . . He answered,
> "Care not thou!
> Thy duty? What is thy duty? Fare thee well."

That ancient never-ending conflict between good and evil, to which all things about us testify and which we have all had trial of, discloses the weakness of man and his need of a Helper. The war is inevitable unto the death, till the soul is freed in holiness or ruined in corruption.

A few months ago the writer was thrown into the company of a typical man of the world, a person of high social standing, of wealth, and considerable culture. He was a Hebrew by descent, but had lost the faith of his people, and in reply to a suggestion of the obligations of morality he responded boldly: "Morality! it is a word. I practice all the vices—only everything with moderation." We spoke of duty to his fellow-men, as well as to himself, and reminded him of the purposes and vows of his youth. He answered with force and composure that duties are often dreams; that there is no absolute code; that all things are relative, virtue with the rest. What more is needed than to be kind and care for one's health? In the last analysis every man must judge for himself. "All things are good, and moderation is the soul of virtue." We thought we heard again the voice of false Sir Tristram, as he sapped the scruples of Isolt, in "The Idylls of the Kings:"

> The vows!
> O ay! the wholesome madness of an hour;
> They served their use, their time.
> Bind me to one? The great world laughs at it,
> And worldling of the world am I.
> . . . We are not angels here,
> Nor shall be. Vows—I am woodman of the woods,
> And hear the garnet-headed yaffingale
> Mock them: my soul, we love but while we may.
> And therefore is my love so large to thee,
> Seeing it is not bounded save by love.

Philosophy has been looking for a long time for a secular basis of morals, for a stable sublunary foundation of obligation and duty, but thus far no anchorage has been found which holds when the storms of passion blow or the currents of self-interest crowd virtue from her moorings. Permit Antigone to make her appeal to "the settled laws of nature and of God," or the young Hebrew slave to cry out, "It is a sin against God," and there is a way of escape. But if we deny the moral order of the universe by denying a moral governor it will not be long before philosophy herself will turn traitor and find apologies for corruption. Let us remember that the word "ethics" means, in its etymology, custom, usage, popular manners. What mankind needs is to be lifted above average morality to the fixed and holy standards of the heavenly Father. Their "estimations" must be "according to the shekel of the sanctuary."

These principles have their illustration in the history of Christian Churches. There are Churches in Christendom that are as impotent to purify the social state as the mirages of the Sahara to produce vegetation. What is the papal Church doing for Spain or Italy, or the Greek Church for Russia, or the Armenian Church for its people? It may be feared that these and other Churches are positive hindrances and obstructions to the kingdom of God. And their apostasy lies not in their creeds, but in a dead faith. They have no vital hold upon a living God. They are repeating the sin of the Jewish people, against whom the prophets charged that they had put the ordinances of God in the stead of God and had become idolaters. If we look at the Protestant Churches it may be said generally that the preaching Churches are the reformers in history, while the liturgical Churches are inert and barren. Scotland, Holland, and New England furnish illustrations. The Anglican Church has been effective in proportion as the preaching function was prominent, but the "conscience of England" is for the most part the product of the Nonconformist Churches; and these preaching Churches have been led, not by "priests" who manipulate magical grace at an "altar," but by prophet-preachers who have been instructed in the divine life by personal experience and have heard God's call to their ministry. They are dogmatic preachers. They give forth no uncertain sound. The divine life has its laws, and the laws of the divine life are the dogmas of Christianity. Bricks may be made without straw, but the Christian consciousness—that wondrous consciousness and style of life which we find in the pages of the New Testament epistles, and which includes a vivid sense of sin and holiness, together with a vivid sense of having been redeemed—this cannot exist apart from the great doctrines of Jesus Christ.

THE RIGHT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

Among the natural and indefeasible rights of man conferred by his Creator is that of private judgment. "The absolute rights of man," says an eminent authority, "considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him to be most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated the natural liberty of mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature, being a right inherent in us by birth, and one of the gifts of God to man at his creation, when he endowed him with the faculty of free will. But every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty as the price of so valuable a purchase; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws which the community has thought proper to establish. . . . That constitution or frame of government, that system of laws, is alone calculated to maintain civil liberty which leaves the subject entire master of his own conduct, except in those points wherein the public good requires some direction or restraint."*

Private judgment is fundamental to that "moral or natural liberty" which, in the words of Burlamaqui, chap. iii, § 15, "is the right which nature gives to all mankind of disposing of their persons and property after the manner they judge most consonant to their happiness, on condition of their acting within the limits of the law of nature and that they do not any way abuse it to the prejudice of any other men."

In the right use of private judgment thinking men believe in the being, attributes, perfections, and government of God; in the revelation of his mind and will, in their own individual accountability to him, and in weal or woe as the resultants of free moral conduct. To private judgment the Most Holy appeals in justification of his own administration of human affairs. "And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard. What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it?" (Isa. v, 1-4). "Hear now, O house of Israel; Is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?" (Ezek. xviii, 25.) Responsive to this touching appeal David penitently confesses his great crime, exclaiming, "That thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest" (Psalm li, 4). In the words which our Lord puts into the mouth of the nobleman who was reckoning with servants "that he might know how much every man had gained by trading" with the talents intrusted was an appeal to private judgment, and especially in the case of the wicked servant (Matt. xxv, 14–30; Luke xix, 12–27).

Patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and pious people without number have exercised this inherent right in relation to the highest and most important matters. Every sane person is sovereign, independent, and yet amenable to his Maker. Society holds its every member responsible for what he does as possessor of the faculty and right of private judgment. No one is exempt from the obligation to seek, if haply he may find, what is true, right, and best in all the relations of moral life. If he seek with sincere and fixed resolve to conform voluntary action to conviction—seek in prayerful dependence on the promised grace of the Holy Spirit—he will be led into the knowledge of saving truth, and by the truth be made free from error and from the hurt and grief thence resulting.

Creeds of art, science, philosophy, medicine, law, politics, and religion are the constructions of private judgment. Few may exactly express the convictions of any thoughtful subscriber. The necessity of mutually waiving opinion to some extent in order that all may combine in the profession of what are held as essential truths is the explanation of this incompleteness. Still, in its last analysis every system of formulated belief is the product of private judgment.

In nothing is this faculty more worthily employed than in ascertaining the meaning of "Scripture given by inspiration of God, and profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii, 16, 17). "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son" (Heb. i, 1, 2). The weightiest of these utterances have been carefully recorded by the pens of divinely guided writers, and the record is "God's word written." This we believe on sufficient evidence, in the exercise of natural liberty of judgment.

The contents of this record are plain, intelligible, and addressed to the minds and hearts of men, who are required to study them for the knowledge of what is right and best, in order that they may attain to the highest ultimate possibilities for their kind. Their faith is to rest not upon human but upon divine authority, and themselves must be the subjects of that faith. To this end the first recipients of oral and early of written revelation were commanded to teach the law unto their children, who in turn should teach it to their children, and so on continuously throughout the coming centuries (Deut. vi). The "holy oracles" were committed to the people, were to be taught by the people, and the truth from God was to be preserved in its purity. Christ recognized the ability of the common people to interpret the prophets correctly when he directed them to search the Scriptures which testify of him (John v, 39). Paul, writing to Timothy, declares that the Holy Scriptures are able to make him "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii, 15). To the Galatians (i, 8, 9), he impliedly affirms their right to exercise private judgment on the teaching of heretics, of apostles, and even of angels; and to test their doctrines by the infallible record. If Christians may judge apostles and angels they may also judge popes, councils, assemblies, bishops, theologians, and teachers in the same spirit and by the same rule. Deut. xiii represents the people as possessing the ability and right to judge pretenders, and as having an infallible rule to guide them in this judgment. All who speak and teach opinions contrary to God's word—whosoever they be—are to be condemned and rejected.

The wisest exercise of the right of private judgment, prior to personal investigation, is to accept the teachings of those held in the highest repute for knowledge, wisdom, and probity. This we do in relation to physicians, lawyers, architects, professors, and statesmen. This, also, we do as touching religion and morals. But this does not absolve us from the duty of verifying our beliefs when ability and circumstance permit. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." He who has thought his way through and out of the domain of religion and ethics is the strongest for good to himself and others. Many persons have neither the time nor the ability nor the patience to verify inherited or acquired beliefs. Others are active as to some, but passive as to others, of their articles of faith. Secchi and Mivart are distinguished as independent scientists, but are simply passive in reception of religious belief. So with all Romanists who sincerely voice the third article of the creed of Pope Pius IV: "I admit the Holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother Church has held and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers." Much of the spirit of this pledge is in the vows which good but fallible men have imposed on candidates for their ministry and for offices in their Churches. The Methodist Episcopal Church is emphatic in declaration of the right of private judgment. Her fifth Article of Religion says: "The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation."

Exercising reason and judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, believers find the greater portion so clear in meaning that there is no room for controversy. Romanist expositors, on the other hand notoriously disagree in exegesis of important passages. Popes have contradicted one another, condemned and annulled the acts of their predecessors. The Councils of Nice, Laodicea, Constantinople, and Trent are opposed the enactment of decrees wholly incongruous with each other. The of Protestantism is far clearer and more definite than that of Roman ...olicism, though expounded by errant "infallible" pontiffs.

Truths necessary to salvation are comparatively few in number, simple, and easy of understanding when the Scriptures are searched and studied their plain, historic sense, as intended and understood by the people the respective epochs of their composition—studied as the consistent ...nations of the divine Mind, one portion explaining and illustrating another—studied in humble, docile dependence on the unerring ...dance of the divine Spirit. The decalogue, the Sermon on the Mount, and the supreme law of love taught in the Gospel are intuitively accepted as divinely true, and with an appreciation of content and significance that is better understood than defined. In respect of essentials, ...on, enlightened and sanctified by the Holy Spirit—as Christ promised (John xiv, 26) and John taught (1 John ii, 20, 27)—leads to substantial and practically unanimous agreement of interpretation. Dissent from the general Christian consensus of belief is almost always dissent from the ...ptures themselves.

As we have seen, there is not unanimity in the doctrinal history of the ...anized Church of Rome. Nor can it be expected, reasonably, that it ...ld be. Christ has not appointed any ecclesiastic, or class of ecclesi..., in his Church whose interpretation of the Bible is of final author..., and to whose view the people are bound to submit. Neither Athan..., nor Augustine, nor Pope Leo; neither papal council, Episcopal ...vocation, Presbyterian assembly, Congregationalist convention, nor ...thodist Conference is authorized to proclaim infallibility of their theo...al formulas. John Robinson, the godly pastor of the expatriated ...grims in Holland, spoke like an ideal advocate of the right of private ...gment in the advice bestowed on the eve of their departure for the ...ic shores of New England: "I charge you, before God and his ...d angels, that you follow me no further than you have seen me fol... the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord has more truth yet to break forth ...t his holy word. I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the ...med Churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at ...nt no further than the instruments of their reformation. Luther and ...in were great and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated ... into the whole counsel of God. I beseech you, remember it—'tis an ...le of your church covenant—that you be ready to secure whatever ...h shall be made known to you from the written word of God."

Protestantism, based on the right of private judgment, affirms that the ...d Jesus Christ commands every man to search the Scriptures for him..., and to determine in his own discretion, and on his own responsibil..., what they require him to believe and do. Obligation to faith and ...ousness is personal. Responsibility cannot be transferred nor as... by parents or Church. As each must answer, so each must judge ...himself. Men must listen to God and obey him rather than man.

It is to the people that the Scriptures are addressed, and not exclusively or specially—save in small portions—to officers of the Church. "Hear, O Israel," "Hearken, O ye people," are appeals that frequently prefaced God's messages through the prophets. Christ discoursed to the common people, who heard him gladly. The New Testament epistles are addressed to the "called of Jesus Christ," "the beloved of God," "called to be saints," "sanctified in Christ Jesus," "to all who call on the name of Jesus Christ our Lord." It was for the people that the evangelists prepared their inspired biographies of the Christ and their narratives of his doings and teachings. It was for the people that the physician Luke wrote his glowing history of the primitive Church. It was to the people that Paul submitted his profoundly comprehensive expositions of Christian doctrine and duty. All postulate competency to understand savingly what is written; all acknowledge the right of private judgment and base upon its normal exercise the demand for faith and obedience. To permit men to come between ourselves and God, to forego the priceless privilege of study and interpretation for ourselves, is voluntarily to forfeit a divinely conferred right and to enthrone errant humanity in the seat of the Omnipotent.

Outside of elementary truths, essential to salvation and so simple that none need misunderstand, the Scriptures contain many things hard to be understood even by the keenest and most spiritual of students. But precise knowledge of them is not requisite to human welfare. It may even be argued whether they do not valuably contribute to apprehension of truth that is clear and sanctifying. The origin of evil, the details of Messianic prophecy, the person of the Christ, the future of his Church, of the Israelitish and other peoples, and the facts of eschatology are matters of which infallibly true knowledge cannot be affirmed. Their very indistinctness and uncertainty pique curiosity, provoke investigation, incite to minutest and most comprehensive study, and lead to widely differentiated opinions. Then, too, there are questions of higher criticism connected with the authorship of various books of the Bible; with the time, place, and circumstances of the composition of each; with the education, secular and religious beliefs of the authors and redactors; with the analysis and synthesis of contents, and with the genuineness of the copies we now possess, on which private judgment, aided by the best and richest scholarship of the times, and by intensely passionate longing for the whole truth, may expend its noblest powers. Whatever the results may be, it is reasonably certain—nay, in confidence of faith we may say, sure—that the truth of God's word will not suffer impairment. The envelope may be scratched and its edges frayed in the frictions of long transmission, but the contents of the letter are precisely what they were when it left the hands of the correspondent.

Private judgment scorns and repels the baseless claims of the papacy. It refuses to be guilty of the awful sacrilege involved in the substitution of foolish man for the all-wise God. It insists upon the enjoyment of God-given, indefeasible rights. John Wyclif, of Lutterworth, "morning age of the Reformation," led the way into gospel liberty, translated the Scriptures into his homely vernacular, multiplied transcribed copies of his translation, and sent forth his evangelists to read and explain them to the commonalty. William Tyndale and Miles Coverdale again translated the Bible and published it in the newly discovered types of Faust and Gutenberg. England rejoiced in the precious gift, severed her relations with the seven-hilled city, and laid broad and deep the foundations of Anglo-Saxon supremacy in modern civilization. Puritans, who sought to govern themselves by the biblical spirit and ethics, completed the Reformation and voiced their interpretation of inspired writ in the classic, terse, and weighty sentences of the Westminster Confession of Faith. Fresh light broke out of God's word upon the minds of those who pondered its statements, changed their doctrinal beliefs, issued in the ministrations of evangelical Arminianism, and reformed the Reformation.

The disciples of Augustine, Pelagius, Calvin, Luther, Wesley, and Channing have precisely the same rights as their masterful predecessors, neither more nor fewer. Honest and manful exercise of these invaluable rights may involve sacrifice, conflict, and suffering, severance of cherished ties, and establishment of new affiliations. But what of that? This is nothing new. It is only the experience through which the servants of Christ have passed from the day of Pentecost until now. It is only in the unrest of aspiration for perfect knowledge, the burning enthusiasm to see right and to do right, and the ceaseless endeavor to conform conduct to conviction, that heroic souls become pioneers of progress, and the race makes advances toward its highest ultimate possibility. God's truth and man's welfare have nothing to dread from agitation. Health is imbibed from the swirling stream rather than from the stagnant pond, and gladsome vigor is derived from the breezes of wind-swept plains and hills rather than from the deadly quiet of tropical jungles. Out of the mêlée and struggling antagonisms the spirit of the devout and manly believer emerges triumphant and strong forever. Light, love, life, and fruitful-ness—Christlikeness, in a word—are the beneficent resultants achieved by this martial toil.

Servile uniformity is impossible under the operation of private judgment. Out of the latter springs diversity like that of the flora in bright autumnal days—diversity compatible with the essential unity of vegetative life. Christians are "diverse as the billows, but one as the sea." Civil and religious liberty are safe under the ægis of private judgment. Under the crowded claims of a sacerdotal class, insisting on exclusive right to interpret that infallible rule of faith and practice which men must believe and obey on peril of their souls, they wilt and die. Such a class may impose what conditions of salvation they see fit. Armed with this power they may become, and repeatedly have become, the absolute masters of the people. As Chillingworth says: "He that would usurp an absolute power and tyranny over any people need not put himself to the trouble and difficulty of abrogating and disannuling the laws made to maintain the common liberty; for he may frustrate their intent, and compass his own design as well, if he can get the power and authority to interpret them as he pleases, and add to them what he pleases, and to have his interpretations and additions stand for laws; if he can rule his people by his laws, and his laws by his lawyers." This is what the Church of Rome has done and is doing, wheresoever she had the power. Her domination is always and everywhere intolerably tyrannous. The pope and his multiplied shadow, the parish priest, are arbiters of faith and morals, of all that enters into or impinges upon the life of their abject subjects. The people must believe that the Bible inculcates Romanist dogmas because the Church—that is, the priest—says so. He usurps the prerogative of the Almighty. Private judgment repels his blasphemous dictation, opposes his unholy effort to compel faith and obedience modeled on those of any human predecessors, and inquires what is the testimony of God in his word —testimony authenticated as divine by the witness of the Holy Spirit to his inmost nature and by the witness of the believing mind and heart.

Methodism, as spiritual "Christianity in earnest," owes its singular immunity from doctrinal heresies and controversies—as does the true Church of Christ in every land and age—to the commended right of private judgment. Apply the simple rules of natural interpretation, and practical unanimity will follow as to what the Bible teaches concerning all things needful to faith and practice. This, as the Rev. Dr. Charles Hodge remarks, "is a decisive proof of the perspicuity of the Bible and of the safety of allowing the people the enjoyment of the divine right of private judgment."

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE JEWISH GATHERING IN NEW YORK.

The Jewish population of New York is larger than that of any other city on earth—larger, probably, than the regular population of Jerusalem in the most flourishing period of its history. Competent authority calculated its number in February, 1891, to be from 225,000 to 250,000. Russian and Polish Jews are more numerous than those of any other nationality. Next come the Germans. Hungarians and Roumanians follow in almost equal quantity.

Brazilian Jews were the first comers in about 1634, and were by no means welcome to the sturdy Dutch Calvinist, Peter Stuyvesant, who then ruled Nieuw Amsterdam. In Newport, R. I., the free spirit of Roger Williams greeted them cordially. At both places they took root and flourished luxuriantly. So did their Portuguese and Spanish, British, Polish, Dutch, German, Italian, Morisco, Arabic, Syrian, and other coreligionists who followed them through the "doors of sunset" into the rocky but fertile pastures of Manhattan Island. To all tribes of the "wandering foot and weary breast" New York is a veritable and most fruitful Goshen.

From October 1, 1891, to October 1, 1892, the arrivals of Jewish steerage passengers reached the total of 52,134; 10,000 less than in the previous year. Of these 18,815 were children. 38,504 remained in the city, "dazzled by its brilliancy" and believing that it held room for them in which they could quickly earn competence and observe all the laws, major and minor, which they had been taught to believe are vital to happiness as life itself; and 13,630 were furnished with transportation to other localities. Nine tenths of the whole were in need of and received assistance. 41,456 were Russians, 7,296 Austrians, 96 Danes, 79 Dutch, 299 English, 18 French, 1,928 Germans, 619 Roumanians, 199 Swedes, and 144 Turks. To all, America was the Gentile "Land of Promise," the El Dorado of facile and golden prosperity.

Adding 75,000 to its Jewish inhabitants, as the increment between February 1, 1891, and February 1, 1893, New York now shelters from 250,000 to 325,000 of the Israelidæ within its limits. "Yiddish," Jüdisch-Deutsch, or Judæo-German, a jargon composed of Hebrew, German, and Slavic words, is the vernacular of the greater portion. Newspapers and books are published in it, as well as in pure Hebrew. Theaters present plays in which it is the talk of the actors. Bills of fare reveal its use in restaurants, and Hebrew characters its employment in banks, stores, and workshops. Thousands of those who speak it in the common round of the world's business are also masters of the Hebrew of David and Malachi. Their children often forget what of the latter is learned in schools, and contemptuously ignore the former altogether. "Yiddish," notwithstanding, will endure as one of the historic and instructive treasures of philology. Hebrew, doubtless, will persist as the sacred language until all the tongues of earth are exchanged for that of the spirit-world.

The conditions of metropolitan Jewish society, slowly unifying under the power of modern forces, are those of praiseworthy philanthropy, in which the older and younger faiths are emulously conspicuous. Most prominent of Israelitish humanitarian associations are the Hebrew Benevolent and Orphan Asylum Society, Hebrew Benevolent Fuel Society, Hebrew Relief Society, Ladies' Hebrew Lying-in Relief Society, and Congregation Darech Amuno Free Burial Fund Society. These compose the United Hebrew Charities, whose beneficence is of vast proportions and whose methods are worthy of careful study. Cooperating with them are the trustees of the Baron de Hirsch Fund and the sisterhoods of personal service of the congregations Emanu-El, Beth-El, Ahawath Chesed, Shaaray Tefila, Temple Israel, and Rodof Shalom. The latter include noble-hearted women of the best culture and refinement, large wealth and liberal hands, native shrewdness and acquired discernment, whose womanly greetings, words of comfort, and timely donations shed sweet light on sad hearts and inspire energy and hope. The poor need not the gifts of the rich so much as they need the rich themselves.

In the corporate year ending October 1, 1892, the United Hebrew Charities of the city of New York received $327,071, including $96,486 from the Central Russian Refugee Committee, $87,500 from the Russian Transportation Fund, and $48,333 from the Central Committee of the Baron de Hirsch Fund. Their coreligionists preach, pray, solicit, give, plead, and dance in their aid; $16,160 came from the Purim Association ball. Unwisely, as we think, in view of the persistent Roman Catholic attempts to effect a union between Church and State, they also accepted $1,500 from the civic Board of Estimate and Apportionment. Judaism has some affinities with, but more repulsions against, Roman Catholicism; and dependence upon State aid is one of the former. Still, in view of the appalling magnitude of the task forced upon it, and of the fact that Jewish tramps, inmates of workhouses, and burdens upon States and communities are proudly affirmed to be altogether wanting, we are not disposed to criticise this fault too harshly. The metropolitan Israelidæ appear to be in training for beneficence on a yet more extensive scale in the future.

Of the $321,311 disbursed in the last fiscal year, $77,696 were expended on the resident and transient poor, $28,285 on transportation of immigrants to near and distant points, $1,914 in helpful work on Ellis Island, $6,514 in procuring employment for those willing and anxious to work, $18,568 in supplies for the poverty-stricken, $6,221 in medical relief, $3,026 on industrial schools, $3,006 in maternity relief, and $6,739 for the free burial of the strangers who came hither in search of home and found the grave. The Hebrew Technical School received $1,000, the Central Russian Refuge Committee $145,200, and $22,882 were devoted to the payment of house and office expenses and salaries. 62,576 persons were relieved in various ways, at a total cost of $151,974. Independently of this sum, $38,962 were received from the Baron de Hirsch Fund and expended by the agents of the United Hebrew Charities and the Central Russian Refuge Committee for relief, transportation, tools, maintenance, supplies, and rent; $37,662 were received by the Russian Transportation Fund and devoted to like purposes.

That these "least desirable of all immigrants," belonging as they do to the laboring, artisan, mercantile, and professional classes, repay the gifts and care bestowed upon them is repeatedly evidenced by the calls of American mills, factories, and employers for help of the same class. The derided exiles, instructed and grateful, become useful members of the commonwealth, builders of bulwarks for popular liberty, and industrious, orderly citizens. Schools for the young, manual training and agricultural work for adults, are zealously improved by them to these ends. The children are bright, docile, artistic, skillful, and adaptable. Adults prove to be keenly perceptive of their own interests, readily affiliate with co-workers of other races, aspire to like standards of living, and promptly demand the same rates of compensation. Exploitation is frustrated in the scheme of making them permanent victims, and in its defeat lies the safety of workingmen generally. In the country it is the same as in the city. Workers on farms, in gardens and vineyards, evince aptitude for their tasks, and wrest from the soil a livelihood not unfrequently complemented by the labors of winter and by womanly industry in the manufacture of shoes and clothing. That divine Providence has them in training for most important ulterior ends is not at all improbable.

Religiously the Slavic Jews are of the "most straitest sect" of their people, orthodox and Pharisaic in the extreme, and punctilious in keeping to the minutest letter of Talmudical law. Contact with free Christian and secular thought soon tones down their fanaticism into German conservatism. Thence the transition into Anglo-Saxon liberalism is gradual and easy. Radical reform is the last development. Obsolete forms of prayer are discarded, ritual is modernized, English substituted for Hebrew, circumcision rejected, hats removed in worship, tallith and tsitsith consigned to forgotten wardrobes, family pews adopted, and feminine singers admitted to the synagogal choir. Confirmation is prized for spectacular effect and for deep impression upon the candidates. Religion and ethics are diligently taught in synagogues and Sunday schools. Theological and political opinions conflict. All are professedly drawn from the Old Testament, rationally and critically interpreted, and in harmony with deepest intuitions of the right, the beautiful, and the good. Private judgment repudiates the authority of traditional rabbinism. Rabbins themselves lead divergent tendencies. Some exemplify orthodoxy, others liberalism. Here and there one becomes an avowed convert to Christianity. Laymen are of all shades of opinion from Pharisaism to anarchism. Some admire Robert G. Ingersoll; others, like the gifted Benjamin F. Peixotto, believe that of all forms of religion Christianity is the richest, purest, and best. Felix Adler, in his motto, "Deed, not creed," represents the utilitarian element; Wolff and Rosenberg, the dying superstitions of dreamy cabalism. More than are publicly noticed glide into Christian churches; others refrain from following preference and precedent from love for parents. All learn to differentiate false from true Christianity, and are surely learning what the Christianity of our Lord Jesus Christ is. Theology, social ethics, and ecclesiology are in condition more or less chaotic; but out of the tumultuous confusion emerge thought, religion, ethics, morals, and communal energy of higher type than any distinctive of the race in the past, and that prophesy grandly benign achievement in the future. In what regions and through what qualities that achievement is to be manifested may at least be plausibly conjectured.

That there are sufficient pecuniary resources for the part that the Israelite may be called upon, providentially, to enact in the future is obvious, and only in the colossal wealth of the Rothschilds, Bleichröders, and Goldschmidts of Europe, but in the enormous riches of the New York Hebrews. The value of the fee simple in the city held by them is estimated at not less than $200,000,000. Money in their hands multiplies as if by magic. Men who began business as peddlers are now multi-millioned financiers. The available capital of bankers, including the Seligmans, Wormsers, Borg, Lazard, Scholle, Kuhn, Loeb, Schiff, Ickelheimer, Speyer, Schafer, and many others, exceeds $100,000,000. Shipments of gold to and from Europe are principally in their hands. Their wealth is chiefly in readily convertible form. Five sixths of the twelve hundred Broadway wholesale firms between Canal Street and Union Square are of Semitic constitution. In the side streets they also predominant. The establishments of Stern, Arnold, Altman, and Bloomingdale, and many others, are owned by the same race. The aggregate rating of about twenty-five hundred leading merchants is not less than $250,000,000. Those engaged in the dry goods and fancy trades control not less than $65,000,000. About $30,000,000 are invested in the manufacture and sale of clothing, about $10,000,000 in the cloth trade, and $15,000,000 in that of hats and gentlemen's furnishing goods. Nicotic trades use not less than $16,000,000, wine and liquor manufacturers and merchants from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. Jewelry and optical instrument dealers utilize the power of $10,000,000, leather merchants that of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, paints and glass upward of $6,000,000, meats over $5,000,000, and miscellaneous trades about $50,000,000 more.

In these days when coins constitute the indispensable instruments of commerce and warfare the autocratic ruler of one hundred and twenty million souls is comparatively powerless of aggression while lacking the requisite store. The volatile, vindictive French may lend political countenance to floatage of Russian loans, but the undertaking fails because the hostile sons of Jacob abstain from cooperation. In cases that command sympathy and confidence of lucrative repayment their touch opens concealed repositories whence flow the means for raising, equipping, and maintaining fleets and armies, for initiating and executing gigantic international enterprises, and for changing the face of affairs and the current of events over large areas of the world's surface. Much—it may be most—of this awfully responsible power is lodged with the three hundred thousand Jews of New York. Is it for any and all purposes save those directly connected with their own unique and practically imperishable race? Or is it for the fulfillment of destiny foreshadowed by prophet and apostle—a destiny in whose glory and blessedness all nations will be equally entitled to share?

Extremes of opulence and penury, luxury and squalor, cleanliness and filth meet in the Jews of New York; but the swift ascent of all on the lower to higher planes of civilization is astonishing. Jewish wealth and energy are doing marvels in the transformation of Israelites from all parts of the globe into ideal American citizens. The material supplied is intensely human. Good and evil blend in it, as in all divisions of the Adamic family. Between any two of these divisions of the human race there is little moral difference. Heredity in respect of mental endowment is more marked in the Hebrews. Critically observant, thoughtful, acute and quick in reason, never forgetting and always acquiring, flexible and accommodating, and with will whose dogged tenacity nothing can shake, they thoroughly avail themselves of all educational advantages, and especially of such as conduce to personal aggrandizement. Religious schools are attended by assisted pupils mainly; trade institutions by pushing, wide-awake boys and girls; lectures, evening classes, and libraries by workers whose early opportunities were restricted by circumstances. Kindergartens are crowded with delighted urchins, and public schools with students whose religious faith is justly inferred from their absence on the great Jewish holidays. The College of the City of New York, and the New York Female College, designed particularly for the training of teachers, contain more Jewish pupils in proportion to Hebrews in the municipality than they include scholars of any other racial extraction. The same remark is largely true of local colleges and professional schools. Thence in order that they may learn, in the light of freedom, in the enjoyment of equal rights, and under the fructifying warmth of love kindled at the sacrifice on Calvary, what the religion of their rejected Messiah really is.

They are learning the lesson, and as they learn are modified in belief and practice. They, or rather many of them, are proud of Jesus of Nazareth as one of the most beautiful and fruitful branches of the Abrahamic stock. They prize the friendship of his disciples while disagreeing with their Christological conclusions. They see in Christianity, as the religion of love and good works, what is identical with the essence of their own. The most erudite and statesmanly of their theological and churchly leaders does not hesitate to invite Christian ministers into his pulpit to address his Sunday school, to confer with his people on modes of social usefulness, or to give Adam Clarke's Commentaries on the Bible an honored place on the shelves of his library. Dr. K. Kohler, of Temple Israel, gladly recognizes in "Jesus of Nazareth and his apostles the greatest harbingers of light for the heathen world." He avows: "We readily acknowledge him to have been one of the world's sweetest preachers, one of Israel's loftiest prophets, one of the great redeemers of the lost and forsaken of the race, one of the noblest teachers of morals that ever lived," yet only a man of the highest grade. It is true that the Jews deny the conventional Christianity of the time to be what Jesus taught and illustrated. Neither is it. But they are in error as to what he really did teach and practice, except in so far as his teaching was of love and his practice perfect beneficence.

Some of the learned Jews, like Professor Ehrlich, the collaborator of Delitzsch in the translation of the New Testament into Hebrew, are profound students of that volume and judicious commentators upon its purely Jewish features. While Hebrew eleemosynary institutions are the recipients of some princely Christian benefactions they learn to make grateful return by grateful bequests and gifts to Christian charities. The sisterhoods of personal service are judicious emulators of the "King's Daughters," of whom they speak as "a society of Christian ladies to whom we owe many acts of kindness to our poor." These "Daughters of Israel" clearly perceive that "it was through the self-sacrifice and uplifting power of the early Church" that "a great impetus was given to civilization," and do not shrink from consciously imitating Christian plans of saving labor. Christian literature is not excluded from library or center-table, nor the Old and New Testament Student and the Hebraica from helps to correct interpretation of the Scriptures.

Few of the Jews, and especially of the rabbins, evince any disposition to embrace Christianity openly. Occasionally one will profess, more or less sincerely, a desire to do so. Jewesses are as willing to marry Christians as Christians are to marry Jewesses. Tens of thousands, men and women, have listened to the expositions of the Rev. Herman Warszawiak, a converted Jew, and hundreds have become the followers of his Master —some of them "secretly, for fear of the Jews." Many have been led to faith in Christ through the ministrations of the Rev. Jacob Freshman, of the Hebrew Christian Church. Irregular attendance upon divine worship in Christian churches is not uncommon. Objections to "conversionism" seem to have lost something of acridity. The obligation to accept what is truest and best is more and more conceded.

The trend of metropolitan Judaism is resistlessly toward Christ. So we believe, and in believing find in the fact believed another reason for the faith that is in us, that in this remarkable gathering of the Israelites in the city the great Head of the Church is preparing instruments for a near and glorious development of his kingdom upon the earth. To what purpose is the terrible discipline formerly endured, the special training in American city and country; for what their splendid abilities and fabulous wealth, if not for repatriation in the land of their fathers? Have they not the leaders, resources, qualities, and experiences needful for the construction of an independent nationality, free, glorious, and cosmopolitan? So we believe.

But the Jews themselves have no such ambitions? Some have—some have not. Goshen was preferred by many in Egypt to the land flowing with milk and honey; and the more, because wilderness and warfare lay between the two. New York is the Jerusalem of the self-satisfied reformer. America is his country. He does not want to go to Canaan, even if he could. But the orthodox majority pray for restoration to the paternal hills, plains, and valleys; and in the prayer millions of Christians, in wrong or right spirit, concur. There is scarcely a nation in Europe or America but would willingly bid them good-bye. None really feels that while the Israelite is with it he is of it. He is extraneous, original, unassimilable. He may be republican, monarchist, or absolutist —and that conscientiously—but still he is alien in blood, creed, and natural isolation. Why should he endure this jarring relation unless for the fulfillment of some high mission? He is not a purer monotheist than his Christian brother, nor a more effective advocate of truth, love, and righteousness. He is the standing miracle of the ages, driven from his native seat, "scattered and peeled" in strange countries, that in his rough and extraordinary struggle for existence he may acquire the faculty requisite for the establishment of an independent nationality.

That the Israelidæ will return to the realm granted in fee simple and promised to Abraham and his seed (Gen. xv, 18; Josh. i, 4) is obvious in the light of prophecy. Major and minor seers glow with holy enthusiasm when they predict, not merely return from Babylon, but the final return from all nations into which the Lord had driven them. That the region allotted to Abraham and possessed by Solomon—reaching from the mouth of the Orontes to the Red Sea, from the Mediterranean to Mesopotamia—is ample in size and resources to accommodate the ten to twelve million Israelites in the world does not allow of question. Surprisingly fertile in the Hauran and other sections, yielding fruits and cereals of all descriptions, offering abundant pasturage to flocks and herds, rich in mineral treasures, and with few available seaports, it affords special inducements for the construction of railroads. Turkey, the nominal suzerain, deeply indebted to Jewish creditors, is moribund, and only survives through sufferance of the great Powers, who will not consent that his estate should pass under the sovereignty of any in their own category. The rightful heir only is entitled to succession, and that heir is Jacob. The "principle of nationalities" now in vogue with modern civilization demands that he be put in seizin of it.

Investiture with patrimonial rights is alleged to be the ambition of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, the goal of occidental, and the desideratum of oriental, Jews. European statesmanship favors, and only Ottoman perversity frowns upon it. As the probable issue of modern race agitations and the solution of vexed political problems it commends itself to the good graces of Americans, of whose most gifted Semitic brethren one has said: "They, who in our own generation have led the Conservatives of England, the Liberals of Germany, the Republicans of France, can surely furnish a new Ezra for their own people."

These people know when it is most fitting to foreclose practical mortgage upon their own territory. They are upon the spot. Jerusalem, with seventy-five thousand inhabitants, embraces forty thousand Jews, against less than five hundred scarcely half a hundred years ago. In other Palestine towns they increase. Cities swell without the walled precincts. Agriculture and trade prosper. Public works are in progress. Good roads supplant ancient footpaths. American locomotives draw loaded trains from Joppa to Jerusalem. From thence by way of Gaza and El Arish to Port Said and Ismailia, connecting with the Egyptian system of railroads, their shrieks will soon wake the drowsy echoes. Nor there only, but also in northern Palestine. Concession is held by capitalists for the building of a road with littoral termini at Acre and Haifa. Northeast of Carmel the branches unite, and thence pass in single line up the plain of luxuriant Esdraelon, across the Jordan, and through the teeming Hauran to the ancient Damascus, upon her "Abana and Pharpar." About fifty years ago Colonel Chesney surveyed a railroad route from Alexandretta to or near Edessa, thence down the Euphrates valley to Bassorah, whence British troops, missionaries, and merchandise may be shipped to India by way of the Persian Gulf. Such a road would develop the resources of the old Davidic empire. Energy, skill, and capital can revive and concrete the project of construction, convert the Land of Promise into one of the busiest routes of commerce and fields of industrial art, and raise the Israelitish autonomy to more than Solomonic splendor.

What then? Suppose the vision should be realized? This: American-schooled Jews would be the brain, muscle, and will of the government. American friendliness and approximately pure Christianity would draw the veil that shuts out the sight of the Messiah from mind and heart. In Christ they would see their own redeeming Lord. Those with clear vision and trustful heart will help to bring in "the fullness of the Gentiles." Then it is that "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi, 26). The significance of the Jewish gathering in New York lies in its immediate relation to that glorious end.

PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.

All society is a compromise. The ideal community, guaranteeing the greatest possible benefits to the individual, and securing as well the highest interests of the body politic, has never been realized; and, with the perverse tendencies of human nature at full play, can never be constructed. Possible, in the institution of this ideal society, the theorist would make use only of homogeneous elements, and those the best—in the formation of actual public structure the most composite materials are necessarily employed. Heterogeneity is the existing rule. Society, for instance, is diverse in the intellectual vigor of its constituent members and in their improvement of opportunities for education. While the high school and college have been working their wonderful transformations within the last half century, and like some radiant sun have steadily dispelled the shadows of ignorance, the widespread continuance of illiteracy is nevertheless a saddening feature of all national life. Alongside of the academy and the unlettered boor. Within the shadow of the oldest and best equipped universities of the world it is easy to find some unschooled soul ignorant of the rule of three and of the very alphabet. Humanity needs education. Every public orator, whether he speaks of politics or religion, is conscious of this truth, and, bearing himself toward some proportion of the community as toward untaught children, adapts his methods to the occasion. Industry is also a variable quantity in the social life. The occupied worker and the unoccupied idler live as close neighbors. That many have the industrious disposition is a guarantee for the continuance of the whirling wheels of engines, the white furnace heat of foundries, the clang of the miner's hammer, and the stir of weaving looms. That others have the sluggard's instinct is a cause, aside from vicious habits and ignorant waste, for somewhat of the pauperism of the day, and will be a reason in the far future for disagreeable and narrowing poverty. Men cannot be made industrious by legislation. The bias toward idleness, that seems in many cases hereditary, is one of the mighty obstacles in the way of the radical reforms that political economists would work; and this bias is a recognized condition in every human government. Virtue and vice are, moreover, varying factors in the social constitution. Peasant is the dream of the ideal commonwealth. Given to the reformer the power to exercise his untrammeled will in the creation of some new state, and it is easy to picture the ingredients that he would introduce into the new structure. Viciousness of every sort would be avoided. The saloon would be tabooed; the lottery and gambling would be forbidden by law; political bribery and the extortion of corporations would be impossible. And, as a corollary, from the restrained passions of men and the indoctrination in virtue the civil and criminal court would pass into disuse; while the penitentiary and prison would become almost as traditional as the legendary cruelties of the Bridewell and the Bastile.

But this is a picture only. The actual society is a continual compromise. Even in the purest corporate association of the earth the baser elements prevail and threaten to predominate. Extortion is as old as the race; robbery goes on with every nightfall; the saloon is rooted into the deepest soil; murder is world-wide, and the prison is a necessary institution under every phase of government. Not only the king, ruling his wide domain, or the lord mayor of every crowded metropolis, but the magistrate of the rural township, and the warden of the most obscure village, will testify from sad experience to the persistent hindrance of good government from the perverse passions of men. And until the end this composite moral structure of the social fabric will continue.

But the confession of this diversity in the public life is not an argument for indifference to the common weal. Society must still struggle on toward its ideal. More's dream of a western Utopia, though only a fancy, should not perplex, baffle, and dishearten the reformer. It is rather one of those visions which break upon the sordid sight of men and call them to higher endeavor. Inactivity is unphilosophic. The well-being of society calls for a reaching out after better things. Ignorance must be enlightened. Industry must be fostered. Nationalism must be insisted upon. In arbitration must be found redress for wrongs. Law must be enforced. Vice must be restrained. So shall the new age come as near as imperfect humanity may to the realization of its noble dreams.

Annexation has lately become a popular watchword in the circles of American statesmanship and commerce. Toward some far islands in the Pacific, whose area is but the relatively small number of 6,400 square miles, and whose population, by the census of 1890, was only 90,000, the United States is credited with turning an envious eye. And, carried away on a wave of popular enthusiasm, the newspapers of the land, those makers as well as recorders of public opinion, are quite generally emphatic in their demand for the annexation of Hawaii. The questions of international law involved in the proposal are not uninteresting. The right of the larger governments of the earth to appropriate to themselves the water ways, the islands, or the unoccupied tracts of the main continents is a claim over which one as a disinterested spectator may philosophize. Nations are but groups of individuals; the same fundamental laws that permit the acquisition of personal property by gift, purchase, or conquest would seem to obtain in the increase of the national domain. The principles of equity are unchangeable, whether they have their application to the individual or the many. But while the proposed annexation of Hawaii falls within the provisions of international law and is in harmony with the current practice of the governments of the world, the experiment for some reasons seems one of doubtful utility. Even on the lower consideration of commercial interests the financial returns to the government of the United States would not seem to warrant the outgo. The revenue that would accrue to the home nation by the annual production of sugar in Hawaii would be perhaps largely offset by the increased expense for the maintenance of an enlarged navy. The claim that the island is the gateway to the Eastern World, which the United States cannot afford to renounce, is sentimental. Hawaii is tropical, un-American, distant. All of which are considerations that have been sufficiently urged and that belong to the realm of practical affairs. But, on the higher ground of ethical relations, the Hawaiian annexation is a hazardous experiment. The assumption of paternal relationship on the part of the United States toward these far dependents of the Pacific involves a moral obligation that should not be lightly incurred. Like the union of two individuals in lasting compact, the new association implies a new indebtedness by the republic to its wards. The establishment of better schools, the inculcation of practical arts, and, in short, the importation of all ethical and religious light which in the home land has been so blessed, would be our immediate obligation to Hawaii. The United States could not assume a supervisory relation to the Hawaiian islands and withhold these higher ministries which the divine law demands. Nor has its duty toward the great masses within its own shores been so fully met as to warrant as yet the assumption of new obligations toward a new territory.

THE movement looking to "divorce reform," which of late is assuming large proportions, must receive the sanction of every defender of morals in the land. The evils resulting from the lax and inharmonious marriage laws of the different States of the Union seem constantly on the increase. From the story of disrupted homes and of applications for the annulment of the marriage compact, as written in the daily prints, but one lesson can be drawn. Disregard for the divine law concerning the sanctity of matrimony is widespread and flagrant. Separations are on the increase. No class escapes. Every age, every nationality, every rank, every profession, stands at the bar of civil justice asking for divorce. Noble manhood and womanhood, deserving better things, are brought low in sorrow. Innocent childhood must too often bear the lifelong shame of parental misdeeds. And marriage, in short, seems a roaring farce and burlesque! The creation of the Divorce Reform League is, therefore, a movement for which the times cry out. At its recent annual meeting in Boston the announcement was encouraging that the eight States of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Michigan, Mississippi, and Georgia have consented to appoint commissions on the subject looking to the securing of uniformity in marriage laws. The geographical distribution and the prominence of these States, should they reach harmonious action, will go far, it is held, toward the establishment of a uniform law of divorce throughout the land: But what is first needed, it would seem, is a larger emphasis of the solemnity of marriage itself. Too many rush flippantly into this holy alliance. There is no clergyman of any denomination, in actual ministerial service, whose heart is not grieved at the reckless bearing of many applicants for marriage. While compliance with the outward legal requirements has been met, there is wanting that inner and solemn consent to the holy estate which is the essence of true matrimony. It would be an incalculable blessing, therefore, if the door to marriage were more sacredly guarded. Prevention is easier than cure; in fact, there is no cure upon the earth for hopes blasted, hearts broken, and reputations shattered by misalliance. But, the ultimate step of divorce being inevitable in many cases, nothing is more imperative than that uniformity of practice should prevail in the various States of the Union. So unenviable is the reputation of some of these, with regard to the laxity of divorce, that their name has become a sad reproach. The inconsistency between the regulations of different States would seem grotesque were aught else than human happiness at stake. In some States an individual is held to be married to one person; in others to another. In one State no divorce is granted for any reason whatsoever; elsewhere "incompatibility," "intemperance," or "willful neglect" is sufficient ground for divorce. To recognize the existence of this glaring discrepancy, as the Reform League has done, is the first step toward a better condition; to surround the granting of divorces with greater restrictions, as in harmony with the divine law, is the further step that becometh a Christian nation.

MANY illustrious names are included in the recent list of the world's necrology. The departments of statesmanship, jurisprudence, business, and theology have alike been invaded by the great enemy of earthly happiness. Not only has the funeral procession been passing of late with strange acceleration to the grave, but some of the most famous leaders of the times have pressed their way to the front of the march and have been mustered into the company of the immortals. Their going away furnishes an opportunity for mournful sentiment, so far as this sentiment is permissible; is a call to industry for the remaining days of life, if such a call is needed; and prompts the cherishing with tender care of the friendships which remain. But not least of all is the lesson suggested of the new opportunity for leadership that comes with the departure of those who have been at the front. The heights which seemed so steep when active life began do not appear so precipitous now. The great prizes of the world, as they drop from the hands of the dying, are more accessible than in earlier days. Every vacancy at the bar, in the senate chamber, in the market place, and at the altars of the Church made by those who depart must be filled by some one who remains. The promotion of the faithful workers of the earth to the spirit life means the promotion of some survivor to a higher position of influence. "Room at the top," which aforetime seemed one of those innocent and sentimental maxims with which literature is filled, is now the terse putting of a tremendous fact. But this opportunity means a weighty obligation. To stand in the places of service once filled by the mighty dead, to take up their unfinished work, and in inexperience to measure up to their skill, is a responsibility from which the stoutest heart might shrink. So do the dying leave a double legacy to their survivors.

THE ARENA.

SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

One of the important questions demanding the immediate attention of the Christian Church is that of socialism. It is to be regretted that with much which is wise and prudent in the discussion of this question there is mixed up much which is false and dangerous and which thoughtful men cannot accept. We believe that this movement, which is sweeping around the globe, is destined to reach and uplift the last man, the most downtrodden and oppressed. Labor must be made an equal partner with capital. The tiller of the soil must ultimately be made the equal of the owner of the soil. The honest maker of the wealth of the world must be made the honorable participant in the wealth of the world, instead of being a mere pensioner upon the rich man's bounty.

Labor, even in America, where it receives unprecedentedly favorable consideration, still has real grievances. Legislation is too often controlled by moneyed corporations. The laws should be made to protect and favor the poor and the unorganized, the ignorant and the laboring classes, rather than the rich and organized, the shrewd and powerful, who are well able to take care of themselves. We believe that the public should have control of all public enterprises. It is vastly more essential that our own persons should be carried safely, economically, and conveniently than that our mails should be so transported. We believe that the robbery of the people by all sorts of corners and combinations should be stopped by the executive arm of the State. We believe in the redemption of the laboring classes from the oppression of centuries.

But there are certain methods advocated to bring this about with which we have no agreement. Some of these occur in an article, entitled "Remuneration as a Factor in Reform Movements," in the November Review. The article has the ring of sincerity, but we fear that its premises are unsound. We do not believe, for example, that "money is the creature of law." Money, if it be any good, must be the representative of value. As the creature of law, or the accident of the printing-press, "issued directly to the people," as the author suggests, it would, we fear, sooner or later be found to be, instead of an increase of wealth, only an increase of waste paper. This expedient has been tried so often that we are surprised that it finds anyone so belated as to champion it. The personal check is money, and because of its ample security, convenience, and safety more than nine tenths of all the business of the country is done by it. This fact, if none other, would make the volume of money both flexible and well-nigh unlimited. What men really want is not a vast volume of money in circulation; what they desire is real wealth, distributed and circulated by the magic wand of legislation, without sweat or toil, so as to fall somehow into their own possession. Is it not lamentable that the acquisition of money should be given so much prominence in our modern practice, when nobler fields are inviting the youth of America, such as those of science, of art, of philosophy, of literature, of statesmanship, of philanthropy, and of religion?

Further, our Saviour did not inculcate the Mosaic system upon his followers. Note his treatment of the Mosaic laws of divorce, of the lex talionis, etc. In regard to the division of property he says, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?" (Luke xii, 14.) So far from the taking of interest being a sin, even the Mosaic law allowed the taking of interest of others than Jews (Deut. xxiii, 20). The taking of interest is certainly as defensible as the taking of rent. It is more than doubtful if the early Church for more than two centuries practiced communism.* Even Acts v, 4, seems to recognize right of personal property: "While it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?" No doubt great liberality was enjoined and enforced by the early Church, but we are not warranted in assuming that they had all things common. From the statements of our author that Christ taught the Mosaic socialism in the synagogue of Nazareth and was mobbed therefor (Luke iv, 16, ff.), or that he was crucified for driving out the money changers from the temple, we must respectfully dissent.

In the readjustments between capital and labor great patience and wisdom are needed on both sides. The high water mark of wages can only be reached by cooperative association, where capital and labor are one, and labor takes all. But cooperative association demands of labor economy, sobriety, intelligence, and the finest moral fiber, to say nothing of skill and capital sufficient to meet all competition.

And now, lastly, that the regeneration of the individual would regenerate society, our brother, we think, tacitly admits, when he diagnoses the root of the evil in the industrial world to be due to the unrighteousness and especially to the covetousness of men. For there are evils which true regeneration must correct. We must still continue to hold the old-fashioned doctrine that nothing, after all, is so much needed in settling all the inequalities of life as the regeneration and sanctification of the selfish human heart. We should never forget that society is lifted up and made better only as the individual is lifted up and regenerated.

AN UNNECESSARY DISPARAGEMENT.

I HAVE read with interest Dr. H. H. Moore's article in the January-February Review entitled "The Gospel in Nature." I am willing to grant him about all he asks for nature in its relation to the revealed scheme of redemption. His utter denial of the doctrine so long held that the fall affected nature, without deigning to give evidence, is hardly respectful to the eminent theologians, including Mr. Wesley, who have firmly supported that doctrine. There are also a few expressions introduced touching the subject of man's regeneration that the orthodox Church has only been accustomed to find in the literature of evolutionists and mere moralists. Instance the following (italics mine): "His [man's] ruin can be arrested, and the fallen creature started upward on a career of moral improvement." (P. 25.) But as the author is not attempting to discuss a scheme of regeneration we only call attention to these unguarded expressions, without laying to his charge any doctrine of regeneration other than the accepted ones of grace and faith. But we reach the bounds of forbearance on page 29, where, for the sake of emphasis, the author disparages the place of the Old Testament Scriptures in the scheme of redemption, of which Christ and his teachings form the basis. How becoming the following would be if coming from the pen of a disciple of Alexander Campbell: "During his ministry Christ made but little use of the Old Testament Scriptures—barely enough to give them the sanction of his authority. . . . In no case does he draw from them the basal element of the kingdom he came to establish." Is the atonement, or is it not, the basal element of Christ's kingdom? Did not Christ say, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up?" Which best teaches the idea of atonement—an idea with which the kingdom of Christ is indissolubly bound up—the Old Testament Scriptures or nature? Nay, may I not defy anyone to produce from nature a single teaching on the atonement?

The use Jesus made of nature is apparent throughout his teachings; and about all Dr. Moore claims in that direction can be conceded. But why this disparagement of the prophecies? Many of the references to nature found in the teachings of Jesus would have no force but for their prophetic and historic background in the Old Testament. This is true, notably in the lessons from water and manna. It will be further noticed that the use Jesus makes of nature is not for any value per se. He never makes nature the subject of direct contemplation. It is scarcely possible, however touchingly Jesus refers to the lilies of the field, to conceive of him as admitting any intrinsic value in the lily as compared with the great moral truth he was endeavoring to inculcate. We could much more readily believe him to be contemplating, at the very moment of this reference to the lily, the great historical panorama of God's providential care of Israel as spread upon the sacred parchments of Moses and the prophets.

It should not be overlooked that the magnificent reference to nature, as found in the nineteenth psalm, is given for the express purpose of exalting the "law of the Lord," which at the seventh verse is said to be "perfect" and "converting the soul," as contrasted with the insignificant office of the "heavens." "Stand in awe," says Nature, in her grandeur; but Scripture, freighted with the riches of redemption, shows us how to sin not. Can we not get an idea of the value Jesus placed upon the Old Testament Scriptures as we see him using them in demolishing the studied questions of his enemies? Was it nature or the "sword of the Spirit" that Jesus used when facing the world's tempter in the wilderness? Where were the tender thoughts of Jesus when conversing, after his resurrection, with the two disciples on the road to Emmaus? Although the clouds above him may have been like he notes them not. The gorgeous loveliness of his surroundings could not call his thoughts from their rich feeding in the pastures of prophetic revelation. "Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself."

Then it is not a question to be determined wholly by quotations from the teachings of Jesus. Will anyone dare to say that the character of Jesus bears but indifferent evidence of the impress of the Old Testament Scriptures? While there is in his buoyant nature an openness, a freedom from the strict letter of the law, and a joyous harmony with flowers, birds, and brooks, it is unnecessary to emphasize these at the disparagement of the deeper qualities in his character and teachings which were due to his absorption of eternal truth as revealed in the ancient inspired writings.

"ST. PAUL'S IDEAS OF THE RESURRECTION."

THE July-August number of the Review, for 1892, contained in "The Arena" a short article with the above caption. Its positions seem so misleading that from some quarter should appear an answer. 1 Cor. xv, 44, is used as a text, and the questions are asked, "What is the subject alluded to by the pronoun 'it?'" and "What is the object of the argument?"

With regard to the latter question it may be granted that Paul was discussing fact rather than theory. The fact, however, seems utterly impalpable apart from some theory. I call for any evidence to show that such an idea of the resurrection as our brother advocates would have been specially repulsive to the Greek mind. It was a resurrection that signified what it said—a raising of the body—which met with such deep disapproval that it called out the mockery of Mars' Hill. Greek philosophers, I judge, might easily enough have accepted some modern theories of the resurrection. But confessedly the preaching of Christ's Gospel—of which the resurrection was ever a prominent part—was foolishness to these heathen philosophers. There must have been in it something diametrically opposed to their own speculations.

In regard to the word "it" I invite a careful and unprejudiced examination of the Greek of verses 42, 43, and 44. In the original the word "it" has no representative. In the several expressions corresponding to the English "it is sown in weakness," etc., the Greek construction is impersonal, so that "there" might be used as well as "it," and a fair sense-rendering would be, "There is a sowing in weakness, there is a raising in power," etc. When verse 44 is reached the impersonal construction disappears, and we read, "There is sown a natural body, there is raised a spiritual body." Body—soma—in the Greek is not a predicate noun, but is the subject of the verbs. So it is not the whole man that is sown, but the body. It is not a case of synecdoche, but simply of emphatic transposition of subject and predicate. Then, by fair implication, the subject of the impersonal constructions in verses 42, 43 is the same as that brought out in verse 44. The continuity of discussion will not be questioned. "It" is used simply to fill out the sentence in accordance with the transposed construction, and hence refers to that in the natural place of which it stands, namely, soma. In the latter clause of the same verse (44) the translators have used "there" to represent a similar original construction. So the whole labored argument to prove that "it" stands for nekros falls flat. In support of the constructions asserted I refer to Winer's New Testament Grammar, page 522, secs. 58, 59; also to page 549. In both places these passages are given as illustrative examples of the rules.

Some other things let me notice. The definition of the word nekros, while correct for some passages, cannot be admitted as its universal significance. It frequently signifies simply a dead body, a corpse, the precise meaning assigned to ptoma in the argument. Any considerable reading of Greek authors will make this clear, or it can be learned from a lexicon. But suppose it did mean just what is asserted. Upon this supposition much is said about the resurrection from the dead as indicating that the bringing again from hades is the one thing to be considered. Now the resurrection connotes two thoughts, the rebuilding of the house and its renewed occupancy by the former inhabitant. The argument before us loses sight of the first thought. The view is not so much incorrect as incomplete; but the partial vision has begotten distorted ideas.

It seems far-fetched to drag into this discussion of Pauline ideas any reference to the word ptoma—a word never used by Paul, and occurring only five times in the New Testament, in two of these being a disputed reading for soma. But if it must be done it will hardly be denied that what was laid in Joseph's tomb was not the subject of a resurrection in the case of Christ. The reading of Lachman, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Westcott and Hort in Mark xv, 45, makes this to have been a ptoma.

But how about the "sleep?" If in scriptural language it is not the body which sleeps how shall we defend ourselves against the doctrine of a sleep of the soul in the grave from death to the resurrection? There is no defense. I would like to assume that our brother does not accept this doctrine.

Two remarkable statements occur in the closing paragraph of the article. "There is no life principle or germ which inheres in the body." It would seem that this statement is so palpably untrue that to hold it up to the light is all-sufficient. "It is not the body that dies." The expression "dead body" is scriptural. What does it mean?

The theory of Richard Watson, that Paul's illustrations in 1 Cor. xv are illustrations simply, but are not intended to give exact representations of the resurrection,* cannot successfully be gainsaid. There is, then, nothing to be gained from the grain illustration by the defendants of the germ theory of the resurrection. GEO. E. HUTCHINGS.

THE ITINERANTS' CLUB.

HISTORICAL.—THE HISTORICAL STUDIES FOR THE QUADRENNIUM.

In the last issue of the Review attention was called to the study of English, on the part of young ministers, as of fundamental importance. Next in order is the study of history. History is the record of humanity in action, and in its very nature must be of surpassing interest. The arrangement of the course is worthy of notice. For preachers on trial the first study mentioned is the "History of the United States," next, "Scripture History," and then the "History of American Methodism." No one will question that it is of prime importance that the young minister be not only moderately but thoroughly familiar with the history of his own country. It is essential for him to understand the relations of his ministry not only to individuals but to the conditions of the people among whom he is called to minister. It intensifies his patriotism—an element very essential to a true minister. Scripture history sets forth the historical facts, around which the religious development of the world has gathered. By this study he traces the progress of the Church of God and the relation of the Old Testament to the New Testament Church. He thus becomes acquainted also with the great historic characters who have been God's instruments to carry forward the Redeemer's kingdom. A knowledge of Bible history, therefore, must be as fundamental, yea, more fundamental, than a knowledge of the history of one's own country. In the same relation the young minister is called upon to study the history of American Methodism. This is as peculiarly his own as the country is his own, and the knowledge of the history of that branch of the Church in which he is called to minister is certainly essential in order to the most efficient building up of the kingdom of God through the Church of his choice.

Having finished these preliminary studies and having been examined thereon, he is next called upon to study universal history. There are two ways of pursuing all studies; one is to proceed from the general to the special, the other, from the special to the general. Universal history is logically first in order. Beginning with ancient history he passes to mediæval. The student is next required to read the history of missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In the second year the study of universal history is continued; but it now takes the form of modern history, and side by side is placed for reading during the second year the history of Methodism. Methodism is an essential factor in modern history. It is one of the offshoots of the great Reformation. Indeed, it is itself a new reformation under John Wesley. It is eminently proper that this foremost of the religious developments of modern times should be studied in its relation to modern history. In the third year the historical studies are still continued, and the student is engaged upon the history of the Christian Church. The religious aspect of history is fully recognized. In the probationer's course American Methodism is the subject for consideration. The first year is devoted to the history of missions; the second year to the general study of Methodism; the third year to the study of the history of the Christian Church. In the fourth year history is presented in its relation to the development of modern thought, and the History of Rationalism is to be carefully read by the candidates for ordination. A thorough mastery of this course cannot fail to be of great service to the ministry. The importance of the subject here considered cannot be overestimated.

The study of history is of special value to the gospel minister. He learns to trace effects to their true causes. He notes that events connected with the movements of nations have radical relations to antecedent causes. It seems at first that they are spontaneous movements of the human mind. History, however, discloses the fact that when similar mental states are found in great masses of people there must be something out of which they spring—something out of sight to the ordinary observer, but which has nevertheless acted as a cause. This power to trace the influences that produce great national movements is one of the advantages of the careful study of history, and is one of great importance to all who would exercise influence over their fellow-men.

A further advantage of historical study for the preacher is its influence in promoting vividness of style. The successful historian is not only a philosopher, he is a painter. The evolution of events is but a part of a true history. They must be presented in a style calculated to arrest attention. The graphic power of Macaulay is familiar to all. How vigorously, often grotesquely, Carlyle portrays a character or sets forth an event! What a study for style and vigor and clearness are the historical writings of Dean Stanley! There is danger that in pure theological or philosophical studies the preacher may lose that vigor which arises out of the grouping of events belonging so peculiarly to the domain of history. The successful historian must be a master of style as well as a collator of facts and a student of their philosophy; and all these elements are desirable and important in a preacher.

History is a vast field for the collection of material for sermonic illustrations. The facts are important, and they are found in connection with the busy world. They serve one purpose in the book; they will serve a very different purpose in the sermon. It is true that gleaners in this field have been numerous, and they have classified these illustrations under separate heads, so as to be readily accessible; but they are not as valuable as those which one has collected for himself.

The extensive and thorough study of history will keep the preacher in touch with all countries and all ages. It enlarges his mind and deepens his comprehension of the movements of mankind. It leads him to understand how much men may differ from one another and yet each contribute his part to the world's progress. It makes him at once more humble, more tolerant, and more effective.

HOMILETICAL.—MATERIALS FOR SERMONIZING.

THERE is a class of sermonic material, incidental, it is true, but nevertheless vital to a successful sermon. It cannot be stored away for reference in scrapbooks or preserved in memory. It is that unwritten material which gives vitality to all other forms of preparation, and without which all other attainments are but "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." It is incapable of exact definition or description. It is derived from two sources, namely, communion with God and contact with spiritual minds.

It seems, of course, incongruous to speak of the experiences which come from communion with God as material for sermonizing; and yet are they not such? It is true those rich experiences are within reach of all Christians, but in the minister they serve to enrich all that he thinks and says. These experiences determine the selection of a topic, the kind of illustrations to be employed, and the language in which the thoughts of the sermon are clothed. The conceptions of truth in a spiritually minded person are richer and their expression more vitalized than the same subjects treated by one who is not so fully alive to the deep things of God. This does not involve the necessity or propriety of a pulpit nomenclature. Indeed, it prevents anything that is merely perfunctory in tone or utterance, by imparting to each effort of the preacher a freshness growing out of the richness of his present experience. Has it never been noticed how fresh the prayer and class meeting talks of a deeply spiritual man are? The old song has new life when the souls of the singers are expressed in it.

More than this, however, is necessary in order to give efficiency to the preacher's pulpit efforts. He will find great help in a knowledge of the experiences of others. Hence, selected biography must have its place in the preacher's studies. All biography is not helpful. Real biographies are not numerous. If not morbid or abnormal, they are full of material to stir the heart and develop the graces. Mere eulogistic biographies, those which narrate only the successive steps in a career, what positions filled, how he attained them, and how he succeeded in them, are in general of little value.

There was something of a shock in the literary world a few years ago, when the letters of Thomas Carlyle and of Mrs. Carlyle were given to the public, but yet without them their real life would not have been known. Perhaps the world had no business with it; but if a narrative is given to the world it should be a truthful one. So of the biographies of good men and women. Those only are valuable that convey the truth and open views of spiritual life which are helpful to others. A discriminating study of biographical writings, therefore, forms a valuable kind of material for a sermon, both by the stimulus that comes from rich experiences and also by illustrations which are thereby furnished. They keep the heart fresh; they stir the emotional nature; they present thoughts outside of the conventional lines, and they mold thus the thinking of those who read them. These studies and experiences enter into and give effect to the other knowledge of a preacher; so that in a modified sense, at least, they may be termed materials for sermonizing.

PRACTICAL.—"THIS ONE THING I DO."

Every man who succeeds must have a high regard for his special work. Preaching and pastoral labor must be the specialties of the Christian minister. Indeed, they are his exclusive work. They belong together and mutually supplement each other. "This one thing I do" is specially applicable as a motto for him who would lead men to Christ. He must first of all preach. This is not a mere expedient of the Church, but the divinely ordained means for bringing the knowledge of salvation to men. "How shall they hear without a preacher?" While pastoral oversight is very important, preaching is essential. It is not uncommon to disparage preaching; but, from the time when Jesus delivered his inimitable Sermon on the Mount until now, preaching has been the instrument which the Holy Spirit has blessed for the diffusion of the divine truth. "As Christ himself," says an authority, "was the Divine Word made flesh, so, designing to employ human agency for the promotion of his kingdom among men, he made a special appropriation of man's distinguishing faculty of speech by appointing it as the primary and principal means of diffusing God's word of truth and message of salvation throughout the world. . . . It resembles the best forms of demonstrative address, but transcends all secular oratory in the moral grandeur of its themes, and especially in its specific design of enlightening and quickening the consciences of men as a means of affecting their earthly character and their eternal destiny." The history of the Church is therefore largely a history of its great preachers. Paul, Augustine, Chrysostom, Luther, Calvin, Knox, Wesley, largely represent to the world the progress of the Church of Christ.

Perhaps no more striking illustration of this devotion to a single work is found than in the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, whose loss is so widely mourned by the whole American Church of all creeds and names. One writer, Dr. Abbott, said of him before his death: "He was always and everywhere a preacher. I doubt whether he has ever given a popular lecture in his life; I do not recall a single literary, or scientific, or political address, nor, interested as he is in moral reforms, a distinctively moral reform address; he does not write for the periodical press; he rarely allows himself to be interviewed on current topics; and though he is in great requisition as an after-dinner speaker he rarely accepts, and when he does his after-dinner speech might, with but little change even in form, be repeated the next Sunday as a sermon." This statement might be misunderstood to mean that he never did anything but preach sermons. It rather means that his writings, which were not extensive, grew out of his work and were closely identified with his ministry. Another writer says of him: "With perhaps the single exception of his ventures in verse and his dispassionate paper on the 'Episcopal Church,' in the Memorial History of Boston, Bishop Brooks' claims to be considered as an author rest upon his published sermons, lectures, and addresses." They were, however, first delivered as addresses and afterward put in book form. In this oneness of purpose and work lay, in part, at least, the secret of his wonderful success. Preaching and pastoral work absorbed him. His whole manhood was consecrated to the Gospel. He believed it the true remedy for the spiritual, moral, and social wrongs of the world. He was always and everywhere a preacher.

This consecration to the full purpose of his calling is too often lost sight of by the young preacher. He is in danger of making these subsidiary. These two, preaching and pastoral work, are fundamental, essential. The preacher should, so far as possible, intermeddle with all knowledge and should secure all culture; but they are merely means to an end. They are the material with which he becomes better fitted to "hold forth the word of life."

PRESERVATION OF MATERIALS.

The interest excited among the readers of the "Itinerants' Club" over the preservation of sermonic materials has its latest expression in the following letter, which we are pleased to insert:

Editor Itinerants' Club: Until recently I had long felt the need of some plan by which I might preserve the literary wealth of current papers, magazines, reviews, etc. Many of these, unlike a book in our libraries, must be read once for all and cast aside. I have for some time used a plan which has greatly aided me in this endeavor. I procured a suitable blank book and read with this and my pencil in easy reach. Whenever a thought is suggested I jot it down. Carefully I go through perhaps a hundred articles each week, gleaning their best suggestions and putting them in this note book. A little margin left on the page and an index word written with red ink facilitates reference. Also an alphabetical index in which all these index words with their pages are recorded will aid. A mark across a paragraph and also proper place in index will show that the thought has been incorporated into sermon or other work. This will save needless reference and repetition, and will keep the bulk of references reduced to practical volume. Such a method preserves many of the best thoughts which otherwise we would lose. At the same time it becomes a fountain of varied wealth into which we may dip for sermon material, saving possibly some empty headaches. Previous plans given open us to a library. This one, or some modification, will conserve the wasting literary forces of our best and newest articles. The problem is that of the cistern with a leak which empties almost as fast as the pipe fills. The problem may be solved by stopping the leak.

FOREIGN RÉSUMÉ.

PROFESSOR DR. VOLCK, OF DORPAT.

Professor Volck is a leader in the orthodox party in Germany. He has no patience with that species of biblical criticism which does violence to the reverence which the Church feels for the Bible, and which does not spring from or is not guided by an experience of the great truths of Holy Writ. His view concerning the Holy Scripture is that it is for the Church, as a whole, the normative word of God, and that it contains for the individual the word of God which is able to make him wise unto salvation. Each portion of the word of God is to be judged and valued according to the relation of its fundamental teaching to the whole Bible. The whole Bible is the word of God, and it is a unit. Each book, and every part of each book, has its place and function. But by this he does not mean that the Bible was produced by men who were merely the amanuenses of the Holy Spirit. Such a view must always exist, and can only exist, where the sacred writings are thought of out of connection with sacred history, and when they are made a compendium of religious doctrine, and Scripture is coordinated with revelation. All such must claim for the Scripture absolute inerrancy. Volck does not take this view. He does not call the Scripture revelation, but the record of a revelation, which, though composed of diverse elements, is nevertheless perfectly harmonious, and which is essentially connected with the history it records. The Scripture, therefore, is due to the same forces which produced the sacred history, namely, God's activity in the midst of his chosen people and man's free action in view of the divine revelation. The divine activity did not destroy the human individuality, but rather prepared the human organ for its own action, and fitted it to be the organ of the divine Spirit. Hence he would call the Bible the divine-human word. It is God's, but it is none the less man's word. The divine message became human as the divine Word was made flesh. Hence we see in the Bible the form of the servant. But through it shines the glory of God. The divine operation upon the human authors was as diverse as the elements composing the book. The possibility of error may be admitted in reference to all those portions of the Bible which do not at all touch, or else do not touch the essence of, the sacred history. The Church in the selection of the canonical books was as truly under the divine guidance as were the Scripture writers. The scheme has the merit of self-consistency. It is strongly tinged with mysticism, which seems to be the only refuge from absolute supernaturalism on the one hand and rationalism on the other.

PROFESSOR DR. HERMANN L. STRACK, OF BERLIN.

In this country Professor Strack is regarded by many as an extremely radical critic. And his concessions to the most advanced criticism seem almost to overthrow our faith in the Pentateuch. He defends the rights of the higher critics in their investigations of the Pentateuch. He claims that it nowhere asserts its Mosaic authorship, and that literary analysis has proved with unquestioned certainty the compilation of the first four books of Moses from written sources, and the compilation of Deuteronomy from still another source, while these sources can be traced also through the Book of Joshua. With him the only questions remaining are the number, the order, and the absolute age of the written sources. As to the future results of Pentateuchal criticism he expresses himself cautiously; but one thing is clear to him, namely, that the Mosaic authorship of the first five books of the Bible will never again receive credence. But all this does not destroy the credibility of the Pentateuch; rather it is confirmed thereby. Any history is strengthened in its statements by the concurrence therein of a variety of sources. And in any event Christianity has nothing to fear from the results of criticism. Nevertheless, Professor Strack is, for Germany, a comparatively conservative critic. He by no means accepts the most extreme results of the higher criticism, and as compared with some he is very moderate. He thinks that the Graf-Wellhausen theory will fail to justify itself before advancing civilization. Ezekiel was not written before but subsequent to the so-called Priestly Code. Much which, in the Pentateuch, has been regarded as post-exilic Strack claims cannot belong to a late period. It is most likely that Moses wrote many things which were subsequently embodied in the Pentateuch. In reviewing this scheme, so inadequately stated, it is interesting to note how much Strack rejects which we have been accustomed to take for granted, and how much faith he still has in the old book. Students are often driven to conclusions entirely contrary to their prejudices. This was the case with Delitzsch, who came over shortly before his death to the ground held by Strack. Men who are not familiar with the subjects under consideration can scarcely estimate the arguments which are adduced for and against a theory. Final decisions must be deferred.

PROFESSOR L. SCHULTZE, ROSTOCK.

THE conservative party in Germany holds fast to traditional views of the New Testament far more than of the Old. Of this Professor Schultze is an example. He accepts every book of the New Testament as written by the author to whom it is ascribed by tradition, unless indeed an exception is formed by Hebrews, which he ascribes to Apollos. He represents essentially the standpoint which prevailed prior to Semler, whose rationalism is a thing of the past. Neither the arguments of Schleiermacher, Hupfeld, and Strauss, nor the methods and presumptions of Baur and the Tübingen school, nor the theories of the intermediate school have influenced him one iota. In fact, he denies that we owe any debt whatever to the investigations of Baur in the field of New Testament criticism, except that he occasioned a more thorough establishment of the genuineness and trustworthiness of the New Testament writings and a better preparation for the defense of the citadel of truth. Schultze denies the possibility that the Church of the second century should have been so easily imposed upon as to accept as apostolic works written by the men of the period. Least of all would they have tolerated the perpetration of a forgery in the interest of the truth, since among their foundation principles were honesty and sincerity. The Church of that period had a profound consciousness of its responsibility in reference to the defense of the apostolic truth. This is proved by the fact that they distinguished carefully between the genuine and the spurious. Schultze shows the thoroughly unscientific character of much of the higher criticism of the New Testament from the days of Baur down to the present time. Especially does he affirm that tradition, so far as it can be ascertained by careful investigation, must have more authority than a criticism based upon an examination of the contents of a document. The accusation that this is to accept the principles of Roman Catholicism he repels for the above reason. Admitting the diversity of opinion among orthodox investigators, he declares that there is far more diversity in the opposing camp. In fact, while hoping that many open questions may yet be settled, he believes this can never be done until the critics return from their negative dogmatic standpoint to that of the Scripture and the Church. This, however, would end all criticism, which might prove a great blessing to the world.

RECENT THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

REVELATION AND THE BIBLE, BY R. F. HORTON, M.A.

This is a new sort of critical literature. As to its kind, it is the only one of which we know in the English, and indeed the only extensive attempt in any language, although the Germans have given us very brief treatises of a similar sort. It is an essay in reconstruction. Accepting the results of the higher criticism, he attempts to show what the Bible still is to us. The business man after a financial crash looks about him to see what his condition is. Our author finds himself just as wealthy as before, with a healthier constitution to fit him for future transactions. Henceforth his business will be conducted upon a firmer foundation, with less of speculation, on more rational and on safer principles. Professor Horton loves the Bible, the Church, and Christianity. However he may differ from long-accepted views, there is in his treatise none of that vice of Rücksichtlosigkeit (reckless disregard of consequences, etc.), as the Germans call it, which characterizes so many of the works of higher critics. He assumes as a fundamental principle that God does not reveal in any age of the world what men in that age can ascertain for themselves. When, therefore, he finds records of the flood or of the tower of Babel in the buried remains of the ancient world he concludes that there was no revelation given for the recording of such events. But when he compares the biblical record of these with the extra-biblical he sees God revealing himself and his will through the former. Or, more strictly, God revealed himself in the events, and the record of the events is merely the record of the revelation.

The historical statement of the event in the Bible may not be in every particular correct. But he challenges anyone to deny that there is a revelation of the divine being in the event described. The author enthusiastically believes that so far from damaging the cause of revelation in the minds of thinking men the higher criticism will greatly further it. The whole tone of the book is to be commended to critics. A few more of the same kind by Christian scholars would show that the aim of criticism is not destructive. Too many critics have apparently rejoiced in the havoc they have wrought in the old beliefs concerning the Bible. Horton does not proceed in the spirit of the iconoclast, but as a lover of Christian truth.

AN EXEGETICAL HANDBOOK ON THE REVELATION OF JOHN.

THIS is the fourth edition of Düsterdieck's work, which forms a part of Meyer's Commentary on the New Testament. He takes up here the very latest theories of the origin of the Revelation. The theory of Völter is that the book is made up of five principal groups of elements: 1. The original apocalypse of the apostle John in 65 or 66 A. D.; 2. The additions by the original apocalyptist in the year 68 or 69; 3. The first modifications by an editor in the time of Trajan; 4. The second modifications in the year 129 or 130; 5. The third editing in or about the year 140. This theory Düsterdieck rejects because he finds absolutely no evidence of a multiplicity of authors, but abundant evidence that it was written by one person at one sitting. He furthermore affirms that Völter's hypothesis does not rest upon any fixed principle and hence makes the impression of being capricious. It is to be regretted that he does not discuss somewhat more at length the more scholarly view of Vischer, which is strongly commended by Harnack. According to that theory there are in the work two distinctly traceable elements, one Jewish and the other Christian. An example of the former he thinks he finds in chapter xii, 1, ff., according to which the birth of the Messiah is yet to take place. He finds further evidence in the supposed existence of Aramaisms in all these Jewish portions. This original Aramaic document was worked over by the Christian translator into our present apocalypse. But Düsterdieck thinks it highly improbable that the Christian translator or the Christian Church should have accepted the idea of a Messiah yet unborn, and especially of a Messiah who should neither suffer nor die. And so he rejects the theory of Vischer without giving any substantial reasons to his readers. As to the author of the book, he affirms that the book itself does not assert the traditional view. He is thoroughly convinced that it is not the work of the beloved apostle in banishment upon the isle of Patmos. Yet the book was written by some one prior to the destruction of Jerusalem. Its non-Johannean origin does not deprive it of the authority the Church has always ascribed to it. To the average reader it would certainly seem strange that after acknowledging so much he should deny its author to be John. But the way of the German critic of Scripture is past finding out, for he has a way all his own.

THE GERMAN CONFLICT ABOUT THE APOSTLES' CREED.

A TERRIFIC storm has just swept over the German theological world. Some students asked Professor Harnack, of Berlin, whether in a certain exigency he would advise them to petition the State Church authorities not to require henceforth subscription to the Apostles' Creed as a condition of admission into the ministerial office. Professor Harnack replied that an opinion on such a subject was impossible to one who had not yet finished his theological course, and that to agitate the question would produce confusion of conscience with many and perhaps lead some to take positions which they might later bitterly repent. So far the response was wise and prompted by a desire to preserve peace in the Church. But the learned professor went on further to say that personally he wished that instead of, or alongside of, the Apostles' Creed might be placed a short confession that would more accurately and clearly express the conception of the Gospel as brought out by the Reformation and subsequently in the Protestant Church, and that might do away with certain stumbling-blocks which many earnest Christians, both lay and clerical, find in the language of the present creed. At this people would begin to prick up their ears; but yet his objection to the creed is not made specific. This, however, he proceeds to do. It is the sentence, "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary," which he avers many sincere Christians cannot believe. Those who are acquainted with Professor Harnack's teachings know that he long ago expressed himself as doubtful, if not positively unbelieving, on this point and the related doctrine of the preexistence of Christ. It was not, therefore, his personal belief which produced the tempest, but the fact that he should propose a creed from which that article should be omitted, or at least that acceptance of the creed should not bind the clergyman to read that sentence in the services of the sanctuary. A cyclone of indignation swept down upon Harnack's head; personal and party bitterness increased the fury; misunderstanding and misrepresentation made matters worse. Many clergymen whose only merit is their orthodoxy were among the most active of the agitators. Hence many sympathized with Harnack who otherwise would have opposed him. On the 5th of October last a meeting of theologians sympathizing with Harnack was held at Eisenach, in which it was declared that they had no idea of robbing the evangelical Church of the creed; but they did dispute that its use in the churchly liturgy binds either the clergy or the laity to acceptance of every portion of it. One might reject the article in question and yet be an evangelical Christian if he placed his confidence alone upon the Lord Jesus Christ in life and in death. They further declare that to make the foundation of Christianity the article that the Son of God was conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary beclouds many consciences which cannot accept this declaration as truth. They assert that neither the Scriptures nor the evangelical confessions have given the first chapters of the first and third gospels any such decisive significance, and that neither Jesus nor the apostles in their preaching made any reference to it whatever. Here comes forward again the old question of the person of Christ. That Christ was divine Harnack would not deny, but the miracle of his birth, as related by Matthew and Luke, he does not regard as sufficiently well attested in the Bible to compel belief. It would seem that if a clear statement by two of the gospels could substantiate a fact this fact were sufficiently well supported. But it is just here that we see the use made of the results of the higher criticism. By critical processes doubt is thrown upon the trustworthiness of certain portions of the gospel record, and then the doctrines dependent upon the same are affirmed to have an insufficient foundation in Holy Writ. To affirm, however, as many do, that the divinity of Christ is dependent solely upon the accounts in the first chapters of Matthew and Luke, is erroneous and dangerous. Such a position ignores all that Christ said about himself, and all that his words and deeds evinced as to his nature, as well as all that he has proved himself to be to his faithful followers. But it is distinctly to be noted that Professor Harnack does not find fault with anything else in the creed which pertains to the person or history of Christ. He does not object to the designation of Christ as God's only begotten Son, our Lord, nor that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, nor that on the third day he rose again, and ascended into heaven, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. On purely historical critical grounds he opposes the statement that Christ was conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary. The Eisenach theologians appear to be right when they deny that the article in question is the foundation of Christianity. That foundation is the divine Saviour himself, not the historical method by which he became flesh. Professor Harnack would, apparently, take the statement in John i, rather than that of the first chapters of Matthew and Luke.

CHRISTUS COMPROBATOR, BY BISHOP C. J. ELLICOTT.

ANYTHING which this learned divine writes is well worthy of attention, and especially is this book in which he takes up the cudgel against the higher critics. As the title indicates, the book is an appeal to the teaching of our Lord as to the authority of the Old Testament. After discussing the traditional and critical views as to the authority of the Old Testament he raises two questions: 1. Have we a right to appeal to Christ on the subject of the composition and historical credibility of the Old Testament? 2. Were the limitation of our Lord's humanity and the degree of what is technically called his kenosis of such a nature that his knowledge in regard to the authorship and composition of the books of the Old Testament was no greater than that of the masters of Israel of his own time? To the former of these questions the author gives an affirmative, to the latter a negative, answer. The critical questions connected with the Old Testament cannot be settled solely on critical grounds. The subject is one which demands that we hear what Christ has said, if he has spoken. Furthermore, if we find that he has spoken on the questions in dispute, whether directly or indirectly, we must bow to his authority. Admitting that he had a purely human nature, yet his limitations could not have been like ours, for we are sinful, while he was sinless. Besides, at the time of his baptism, when the Holy Spirit descended upon him, we must believe that he received an enlightenment which was practically measureless. Furthermore, the combination of the two natures in Jesus must have effected both a power and a knowledge within the human nature which it could otherwise not have had. If it be said that Jesus did not assert his own omniscience for himself, yet it must be admitted that he was far superior to his contemporaries in his understanding of everything pertaining to the Bible. Bishop Ellicott finds that Jesus has spoken in such a way as to clearly establish the traditional view of the Old Testament. Since he knew of what he spoke we must accept his authority; and since no theory of accommodation to the views of his hearers can be accepted, there is no escape from the full significance of the pronouncements of Jesus. We can only add that our author has well stated the strongest objection to the critical view, and that his argument will compel all reverent minds to be cautious in dissenting from his conclusions.

RELIGIOUS AND EDUCATIONAL.

FOREIGN GERMAN EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONS.

An evangelical German Church in Sofia has united itself organically with the Prussian State Church, by the consent of the emperor. There are many such German congregations in foreign parts, and whenever they unite themselves with the Prussian Church the authorities in Berlin provide them with pastors who are pledged to remain with their congregations for five years, after which they may return home and be provided with a pastoral charge. In Roumania there are now German evangelical congregations in Jassy, Galatz, Braila, Pitesti, Krajowa, Turn-Severin, Altmadischa, and Constanza. The evangelical congregation in Bucharest is under the protection both of Germany and Austria, but the pastor is subordinate to the ecclesiastical authorities in Berlin. In Belgrade, also, the German congregation belongs to the Prussian State Church.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE OLD CATHOLIC CONGRESS IN LUCERNE.

Among the weightiest decisions of this congress was the conclusion that the teaching of Christ, rather than the opinions of the school theologians, is binding upon the Christian. The use of churches and chapels in common with other communions was commended, upon condition that the offer be accepted in the right spirit. It was believed that such a custom would contribute to religious peace and prove a sign of mutual respect and love. All Christians were called upon to overlook their differences in the conflict against Ultramontanism. Concerning the designation "Catholic" they recognized that in the Roman Church there is still a large number of believing Catholics, yet that the honorable title of "Catholic" cannot be applied to the Ultramontane system, which was established by the Vatican Council and which now obtains in the Roman Church. Hence, they request Protestants of all denominations not to give the title "Catholic Church" to the official system of the Roman Church, and above all not to recognize therein the only Catholic Church, since it neither represents the universal doctrine nor the universal Christian practice and discipline of the ancient Church. Such a request will have special interest in the Old World, where Christendom is recognized as divided into the two parts, Catholic and evangelical—a classification admitted by the language of both Romanists and Protestants. But even in this country their request should serve to correct the manner of expression employed by many.

CONGRESS OF GERMAN HUGUENOTS.

THIS important congress was opened in Berlin on the evening of October 11, 1892, with divine service in one of the Huguenot churches. After the address of welcome and the response the first session was opened on the 12th, in the assembly hall of the consistory of the French Church, and was led by Dr. Tollin, the president of the German Huguenot Association. According to the report of the president the association numbers five hundred and eighty members, who are scattered all over Germany. There are two hundred French and Waldensian congregations. Professor Dr. Marcks, of Berlin, delivered an address on Admiral Coligny, and School Counselor Sander one on Eleonore of Albreuse. During the second day the ecclesiastical Counselor Dalton addressed the congress on the Russian Huguenots, and Pastor Lorenz on "the significance of the French-speaking countries for the history of the French Reformed congregations of Germany during the last forty years." The Huguenots of Germany are not numerous, but they are a profoundly leavening influence among the German people.

THE SLAVE TRAFFIC IN AFRICA.

IN spite of the numerous antislavery societies and congresses the traffic in human flesh is still vigorously carried on in Africa. News has somewhat recently come from Aden which confirms the sorrowful facts. The hard-hearted speculators drive the profitable business of traffic in human chattels more and more. Caravans of slaves arrive daily on the east coast without having met with the slightest opposition in Vituland, which they are obliged to cross. These slaves are shipped from points near Incilah, Massowah, Dhibontit, and Suakim. The miserable creatures are paid for exclusively in modern firearms and ammunition. The cruel treatment of the unfortunates is naturally attended by a terrible mortality. About seventy per cent die on the journey from the interior to the coast alone. New slave hunts were expected during the previous winter in the neighborhood of the Congo State and of the German and English possessions in East Africa. It would seem that something might be done to stop this inhuman traffic in souls if the nations interested in Africa would undertake it in earnest.

EDITORIAL REVIEWS.

SPIRIT OF THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

An article in the Fortnightly Review for December, entitled "Religion: Its Future," and one in the December issue of the New World, on "The Future of Christianity," strongly indicate the confidence cherished by destructive critics that they have wrought such a revolution in Christian thought that evangelical Christianity is doomed, is indeed moribund. In the first named paper the Rev. Dr. Momerie, who proclaims himself a broad churchman, contends that Christianity "is the most remarkable instance of corruption" in the history of the religion of the world. "Christ and Christianity," he says, "are wide as the poles asunder. . . . Critical investigation is bringing into light what Jesus really taught," is showing that in his teaching there was "neither dogma, nor 'the precious blood,'" nor anything of that "orthodox atonement which is as vile as anything to be found in heathendom." As to the Church, he insists that "she represents the religions of the past—religions which Christ and all the prophets condemned—religions which are dying out with the gradual development of the race. The barbaric theory of sacrifice continues to disgrace her formularies; . . . she is essentially antichristian in the importance she attaches to belief; . . . the most highly educated people have discarded the fundamental doctrines of orthodoxy; . . . if she is not reformed she will be destroyed." Her reform, he predicts, is to consist chiefly "in the worship of a deity who is all and only good," in not requiring assent to "doctrines," but only to "Christ or righteousness." But how this Church of the future is to attain righteousness without definite beliefs, the life which is rooted in revealed truth, or the love begotten by trust in the "Crucified One," this inventor of incoherent fallacies does not explain. His theory is as rational as the declaration that a new horticultural method would produce trees without roots. Like all rationalistic theories it stands on the sinking sand of daring assumptions.

The second paper named above is by William M. Salter. It starts with the bold assertion that unless Christianity takes such "a twofold step" as he describes "humanity at large cannot be expected to care much for it." This step means "offering free room for the intellectual spirit of the time," not "by abolishing or revising old creeds, but by granting complete liberty of belief; . . . to have no standards of orthodoxy; . . . to say there is only one heresy, namely, wickedness, and only one essential requirement, namely, the doing of the will of God." Mr. Salter is in doubt, however, whether the Church will meet this alleged condition of her continued influence over mankind. His next point is "that Christianity should go back to Jesus." At present, he says, it lacks "the faith and ardor of Jesus," whose "social dream" it was to introduce "a new social order."

There was "an element of illusion in this expectation," since it has never been realized. But the Church must catch its spirit, go back to Christ's ideal, and strive by fresh contact with him to gain "the faith that mankind can be its own judge, more and more destroying what is evil and garnering what is good." When this is accomplished much of what is earnest and good in the world outside Christianity may be gathered into it.

These papers are cited here, not because of their intrinsic value, for they have none, but to illustrate the drift of thought among men who proudly proclaim themselves to be "liberal thinkers." Both writers are vindictively hostile to Christ, viewed as the sacrifice for human sin. Both papers are characterized by the false assumption that evangelical Christianity is so undermined by scientific criticism as to be tottering and about to fall. Presumptuous men! Their prototypes in Jerusalem imagined that Christianity died when its divine Founder expired on the cross. But as they were ignorant of the inexhaustible spiritual forces which faith in his name was destined to call into abiding activity, so these self-confident modern dreamers fancy that their scientific criticism has well-nigh overturned the faith of Christ. But the stubborn fact is that the Christian Church stands unmoved by their theories, and the power of the living Christ is still mightily working toward the predicted universal triumph of his kingdom.

THE Bibliotheca Sacra for January opens with a luminous paper by Professor W. N. Rice, which outlines "twenty-five years of scientific progress." Next we note a discriminative criticism on "Edwin P. Whipple as an English Essayist," by Professor T. W. Hunt. A third article, on "Criticism and the Common Life," by Rev. A. A. Berle, contends that, since Christianity has been criticised from its beginning without loss to its essential truths, it has nothing to fear from the scientific criticism of the present age. In its fourth paper Rev. H. W. Lathe describes "Some Homiletic Uses of the Doctrine of Election;" but to make it presentable he hides the repulsive features of that dogma by clothing it in garments taken from the Arminian wardrobe. In "Science and Christ" W. W. Kinsley ably contends that the Christian theory of the person and character of Christ bears the crucial test of modern thought better than the theories of infidelity. In a judicious paper on "Old Testament Work in Theological Seminaries" Professor O. H. Gates emphasizes the importance of Old Testament study in theological seminaries because of the critical assaults made upon it by rationalists, and contends that colleges should help the seminaries in this work by making Hebrew "either an elective or an optional." A very scholarly paper by Warren Upham, on "Geologic Time, Ratios, and Estimates of the Earth's Age and Man's Antiquity," makes it very obvious that, despite much investigation and theorizing, our old mother earth has not and probably will not suffer our curious scientists to find the year of her birth. Professor McGiffert, in "The Historical Study of Christianity," argues with marked force and pertinency that this study was never more important than at present. It is intellectually profitable to those who pursue it, and sheds a flood of light over "the sphere of Christian doctrine."

THE New World for December has a lucid statement of the history, the principles, and the prospects of "The Brahmo Somaj," by Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, a member of that Hindoo sect of theists. After reading it one feels disposed to say that its writer "is not far from the kingdom of God." "Progressive Orthodoxy," if not a strictly formal, is a substantial setting forth of the theology taught at Andover. Excepting the question of future probation taught there, not as an article of faith, but "only as an opinion," that theology, as here stated by Egbert C. Smyth, is rooted in a clear recognition of the unique sonship and true divinity of Christ as the object of that religious trust which begets a truly spiritual life and righteous conduct. The spirit of this admirable paper is delightful. In "Michael Servetus," Mr. J. H. Allen sketches the life and character of Servetus, his opinions respecting Christ, the propagation of which cost him his life, and shows how far Calvin was responsible for his martyrdom. In "The Present Position of the Roman Catholic Church" Mr. G. Santayana, after noticing the indications of effort in the papal Church to regain her former ascendency in the religious life of the world, concludes very reasonably that her success is problematical. She can never again be what she once was. The spirit of the age is against her. In "The Church in Germany and the Social Question," J. G. Brooks treats of the efforts of the Church in Germany to counteract the growth of socialism through organized efforts to provide for the helpless and for economic education and by practical sympathy with the children of toil. In "The Birth and Infancy of Jesus," by A. Réville, we note a skillfully written specimen of that negative criticism which, by the free use of daring assumptions, transmutes historic truth into plausible falsehood.

THE Baptist Quarterly Review for October has: 1. An analytical synopsis of the doctrinal contents of Luther's immortal "Theses," by Professor J. C. Long; 2. A paper entitled "Applications of our National Principles," by A. Bierbower, which considers "the peculiar duties of American citizenship." It is very emphatic in pointing out the peril to our republic that is hidden in schemes and combinations for amassing immense wealth in utter disregard of the interests of the people. When wealth is acquired by robbing the industrious classes of opportunities for acquiring competencies it "provides for its own spoliation. . . . A starving people, when numerous, effect revolutions." 3. The Rev. T. E. Gregory, after contending that Judas did not partake of the "Last Supper," reaches the "lame and impotent conclusion" that the assumed exclusion of Judas from the hallowed rite "constitutes good grounds for the Baptist practice of close communion!" 5. The Rev. A. W. Goodnow, treating of "The Jews and Eschatology," finds evidence in the light of eschatological prophecy that God's covenant with Abraham will be literally fulfilled at Christ's second advent, when believing Jews will be gathered into his kingdom. 6. The Rev. C. A. Hobbs ably and conclusively denies "the alleged cruelty of God to the Canaanites." He treats this favorite allegation of deists and atheists exhaustively, going to the roots of the question and elucidating the righteous principles involved in those divine providences which gave Palestine to Israel, in place of the hopelessly corrupt people driven out by Joshua and David. 7. In a sensible editorial article on "the strikes" arbitration legally enforced is recommended, and the desirability of a reform in our industrial system, by which, as estimated, some "four thousand men own two thirds of the total wealth of the United States," or, as other economists contend, "one hundred thousand persons own more than half the wealth amassed by sixty millions." These rich men, the writer says, "may not be dishonest necessarily, but the system that makes millionaires is held to be dishonest. It must be reformed!"

THE Quarterly Review of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for January has: 1. "The Sunday School, Its Place and its Purpose in the Church;" 2. "Henry Timrod;" 3. "Prayer and Providence;" 4. "The Colonial Church in Virginia;" 5. "The Will-o'-the-Wisp;" 6. "Woman as a Breadwinner;" 7. "The Governing Body in Methodism;" 8. "'The Problem' and its Critics;" 9. "A Consecrated Life;" 10. "Our Theology and our Science." Of these papers we note the fifth, in which a sort of free lance metaphysician contends that character and not will determines conduct; but how character is formed without free-willing he does not explain. In the eighth paper Dr. Boland contends vigorously for the theory of his "Problem of Methodism," that when a man is regenerated he is "cleansed from all sin" and prepared "to perfect holiness in the fear of God." But Dr. Boland has many critics in the Church, South, who contend for "a second blessing."

THE Canadian Methodist Quarterly for October last had a very discriminating paper by President W. R. Harper on "The Rational and the Rationalistic Higher Criticism," which, after stating the purpose and principles of higher criticism, discusses its method, spirit, and results. In doing this it judiciously discriminates between the pseudo-scientific, narrow, rationalistic, and destructive criticism represented by Wellhausen and Kuenen, and what it fitly terms that rational criticism which is constructive in its spirit and which reverently recognizes both the divine and human factors in Holy Writ. The result of this latter criticism, it claims, will be a general recognition of the supremacy of the sacred word. President Harper has done a valuable service for the Bible in writing this paper. We note also in this issue of the Canadian a very thoughtful article on "Jonah, the Fugitive Prophet," by Rev. W. Quance. It defends the historical character of "that most beautiful book in the Old Testament canon" against the theory of those who hold it to be symbolical, Jonah representing Israel and Nineveh the heathen world. Whether the prophet actually lived in a fish three days and three nights, or whether he was drowned and restored to life after three days, the author does not pretend to know, but he regards the divine power sufficient to accomplish either event. The lesson of the book is that God was as truly a Father to heathen nations as to Israel. Jonah represented the narrowest opinions of his race so fully that he was vexed when the penitence of the Ninevites saved them from destruction. Hence, in subjecting him to an effective discipline God rebuked the spirit of his people, and in sparing Nineveh he showed that he loved nations which they despised. These, with four other papers, make one of the ablest numbers of this scholarly Review.

Christian Thought for December has: 1. "Our Modern Aristotle and the Theistic Arguments;" 2. "What Was Man Before He Was?" 3. "Shops and Girls;" 4. "Philosophy and Physical Science;" 5. "Notes on Theism;" 6. "What We Supposed All Intelligent People Knew." The first of these papers is a pretty thorough dissection of John Stuart Mill's theistic argument, which it clearly proves to be without any scientific foundation. The second is a unique argument against the theory of man's evolution from a monkey or some other unknown animal. It claims that the question at issue is not the mode of man's origin, but the fact of his creation. The third paper touches upon the interest of a large class of women who seem to be unjustly treated. The fifth claims that no other hypothesis but that of a personal first cause explains all the facts of nature, for even Voltaire admitted that, "if there were no God, though all nature cries out that he is, it would be necessary to invent him."

The Presbyterian Quarterly (Southern) for January discusses: 1. "Some Popular Misconceptions of Presbyterianism;" 2. "Paul's Purpose in Writing Romans;" 3. "Theological Education in Universities;" 4. "Presbyterianism in History;" 5. "Uses of the Imagination;" 6. "Annihilation." These are all ably written papers. We note the second as showing that Paul's aim in his famous epistle was to correct a false theory in Gentile churches that Christianity placed the Jews upon a lower plane than that of the Gentiles. Paul teaches that the Gospel made no such distinction; both were one in Christ. In the third paper it is claimed that theological education should be given in universities, because it is economical in means and men, and because the presence of divinity students has a beneficial effect on college life. It is helpful also to the theological students themselves. The fifth article is a very able disquisition on the value of a properly cultivated imagination to preachers of the Gospel.

In the Hartford Seminary Record for December we note an elaborate and scholarly paper by Professor M. W. Jacobus on "The Evolution of New Testament Criticism and the Consequent Outlook for To-day." This article outlines the history of biblical criticism, showing: 1. That during the first two centuries both orthodox and heterodox critics conceded the historic origin of the New Testament books, but contended for diverse interpretations of their contents; 2. That the criticism of the next following centuries became subjective, in that it sought to prove or disprove their apostolic authorship by their internal character; 3. That the reformers following Luther accepted or set aside their authority as they found or did not find the Gospel in them, neglecting historic inquiry concerning their authorship; 4. That in the eighteenth century rationalism took the field, subjecting the authority of the Bible to the test of reason. The result was the birth of what now claims to be "scientific criticism," which counts historic evidence worthless and "subjective evidence the only thing." Were it truly scientific it would recognize both the external and the internal evidence. As it is, this criticism is one-sided and therefore false. It is "a transitional school." The documentary criticism and the idea of development which is its present fad are animated by the philosophy of evolution, which will probably soon attempt to reconstruct the New Testament as it has vainly tried to reconstruct the Old. Professor Jacobus predicts its failure, but presses upon Christian scholars the duty of mastering those sound principles of biblical criticism which, being true and embracing both external and subjective evidence, must prevail. His paper merits the attention of all students of modern biblical criticism.

THE Lutheran Quarterly for January has: 1. "Recent Research in Bible Lands;" 2. "Christianity and Holy Scripture;" 3. "Civic Christianity;" 4. "Labor;" 5. "Essentials of Effective Preaching;" 6. "Coeducation;" 7. "Frederick C. Oettinger;" 8. "The Revised English Catechism." Of these excellent articles we note the second as a forcible argument in defense of the proposition that, in place of the old dogmatic "verbal inspiration theory," the Church should teach that "the divine influence experienced by the sacred authors wrought in harmony with their own free activity." Hence, their writings "are fitted to be a norm of the Church for all time." Also the third paper, which portrays the social and political effects of the Gospel through its bold declarations of the majesty and eternity of law, its power to arouse and satisfy holy aspirations, and its tendency to realize the brotherhood of men in social and civic life.

IN the North American Review for December Rev. S. M. Brandi, S. J., answers the question, "When is the Pope Infallible?" He does this with Jesuitical plausibility, in that, while denying a pope's inspiration, he claims for him its equivalent in his contention that every truth belonging "to faith and morals may be infallibly defined by the pope." His illustrations of this alleged defining authority show that it may be made to include all that is contained in inspiration, for the definition may change the meaning of the inspired word. It has already defined the authority of the Church to be superior to that of the State, which it affirms is under obligations to pay obedience to the Catholic Church! The value of this paper lies in the evidence it furnishes that the papacy of to-day is essentially one with the papacy of mediæval times. An article entitled "A Campaign for Ballot Reform," by E. B. Grubb, reveals the domination of political corruption in Hudson County, New Jersey, which was brought to light by his efforts and whose guilty actors were punished in 1892. The paper proves that if honest men were united political debauchery in America could be eliminated from the political life of the country, as in truth it must be if our democratic form of government is to be preserved. In a paper which asks, "Is Alcoholism Increasing Among American Women?" Dr. T. D. Crothers contends with much force, if not with conclusiveness, that it is not. "Wages of Sin" is a paper on "general paresis," or softening of the brain, by Dr. H. S. Williams, who traces this tragical disease to excessive mental activity, to high living and other sensual indulgences. His words are faithful warnings. "America's Chauvinism," by S. Rhett Roman, is a barbed rebuke of our national vanity, which feeds on a series of misconceptions too patent to be truthfully denied. The spirit of this paper may be somewhat pessimistic; nevertheless the Christian patriot cannot read it without regretting this unethical feature of our national character and being moved to anxiety in view of its possible results.

THE Contemporary Review for December has a critical estimate of "Tennyson," by Stopford Brooke; a paper on the "Uganda Problem," which contends that England must retain possession of that part of Africa; a scientific paper on "Aryan Origins," which claims that the white races preceded the Aryan; and an article on "The Idealistic Remedy for Religious Doubt," which contends that Christianity must be viewed less as a system of "saving truths and cardinal doctrines," and more as a life resting on the "real facts of Christ's incarnation, with his forgiving, saving, loving hand and voice, and on the real, living Spirit, with his indwelling, sanctifying energy." But how these facts are to be leaned upon without faith in the dogmas with which they are associated its writer, Professor Simon, does not explain.

THE Westminster Review for December has a sketchy but critical and appreciative review of "Lord Tennyson's" poems. It designates him the most representative English poet of the Victorian era. In a suggestive essay on "The English Novel," which pithily estimates English novelists from Thomas Malory, who wrote the first English novel, to Stevenson and Besant, it is claimed that, though the fiction of to-day cannot be compared with the fiction of thirty and forty years ago, yet the general level of everyday novels was never higher than it is at present. This fact, if fact it be, is encouraging to the Christian moralist, inasmuch as from seventy to eighty per cent of the books taken out of the public free libraries in England are novels, which are the sole literary food of millions of English readers. A paper on "The Vole Plague in the Lowlands" chronicles the ruin wrought by short-tailed field mice, or voles, in the sheep pastures of southern Scotland. These creatures are a little larger than a common field mouse and a little smaller than a rat. They do not eat the top of the grass, but cut through the stalks, severing them from the roots. Hundreds of acres of pasture lands have been thus stripped of their verdure, and much distress among farmers has been caused. The sufferers are hoping that the numbers of these voles will tempt birds of prey to destroy them. A suggestive paper on "The Transformation of Energy" explains the alleged discovery of J. P. Joule, that nature is endowed with a certain amount of energy, derived from the sun, which cannot be increased, but only transformed from potential into kinetic or actual energy. Students of science and philosophy will read this paper with interest, whether they accept or reject its theory.

THE African Methodist Episcopal Church Review for January has nine papers of unequal merit. We note one on socialism, which commends Fourierism; and another on "The Origin of the White Race," which traces it to Gehazi, who, by transmitting his leprosy to his descendants, became father of the white race! Alas! that this Review should teach this absurdity to our colored brethren.——The Missionary Review of the World for January is a granary of missionary incidents gathered from every quarter of the globe. Among its many good things we note a paper on "South America and the Papacy," which records a movement in Brazil and in the other South American republics having for its aim "a State free from the dominion of the Church and a Church free from the papacy." This important movement is greatly promoted by the circulation of The Pope and the Council, a book which contains a "vigorously written historic demonstration of the exclusively political nature of the papacy." Thus South American statesmen are preparing to attack Romanism as "the heresy of domination" and as hostile to political freedom.——The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for December has strong papers on "The Christian Pulpit of the Future," on the question, "Is the Bible True?" and on "Biblical and Theological Elements in Whittier," "Tennyson," etc.——Lippincott's Magazine for December has among its minor papers a very interesting sketch of Mr. Keely's struggles to demonstrate his theory that "ether is the medium of all force." It claims that, in the judgment of several noted physicists, the "Keely motor" may yet give the world "a costless motive power" which will work a revolution in mechanical physics.——The Gospel in All Lands for January has a long list of articles which illustrate the progress of missionary movements in every part of the globe. It is a rich storehouse of intelligence, and stimulative of Christian zeal.——In the January issue of the Homiletic Review we note two timely papers, one of which treats intelligently the question of "Theological Thought in Germany;" the other discusses "Clerical Celibacy: Its Extent, Restrictions, and Exceptions," as viewed by Protestants in the light of Holy Writ.——The Wesleyan Magazine (Canadian) for January has three excellent illustrated articles, of which one is on "Egypt," another on "Protestant Memoirs of Neuchâtel," and the third on "Mission Work in the Northwest."——The English Illustrated Magazine for December describes "Tennyson's Homes at Aldworth and Farringford;" discusses "King Lear on the Stage;" gives an inside view of "An Historic Pharmacy;" sketches "Winter in the Catskills;" portrays "Pickwickian Topography," etc. These pages are illustrated with many spirited engravings.——The Treasury of Religious Thought for January is a storehouse of good things.——The New England Historical and Genealogical Register for January is full of papers interesting to students of its special topics.

BOOKS: CRITIQUES AND NOTICES.

A SURPLUS OF BOOKS.

It is not a hasty judgment to say that the literary market is overcrowded. Men write too easily. Venturesome apprentices, conceiving themselves called to authorship, foist their crude compositions upon the public notice. Cheap hacks vitiate the tastes of the reading world with their meretricious productions. Mixed with a little that is good, much is found that is poor or worthless. Paradoxical as it may seem, there is a sense in which the printing-press is proving an injury rather than a benefit to the age. Wise reading, therefore, resolves itself into a choice of books. The familiar advice of many scholars to discriminate in the selection of one's literary company is good counsel. The heart is enriched and the life is molded by what, as well as by how much, a man may read. A few lines from one of the great poets of the ages, a glance at a page of history, or a choice extract from some of the great essayists will shape the conduct of a day. The cautious man must, therefore, be chary in his use of books. The quaint criticism of Robert Hall on a certain miscellaneous reader of books was keen in its satirical force: "He might be a very clever man by nature, for aught I know, but he laid so many books upon his head that his brains could not move." In the interests of good literature the present note is written. Whoever reads the following books will do well: The Distinctive Messages of the Old Religions, by George Matheson; Through Christ to God, by J. A. Beet; and Representative Women of Methodism, by C. W. Buoy.

RELIGION, THEOLOGY, AND BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

The Distinctive Messages of the Old Religions. By the Rev. George Matheson, M.A., D.D., F.R.S.E., Minister of the Parish of St. Bernard's, Edinburgh. 12mo, pp. 342. New York: A. D. F. Randolph & Co. Price, cloth, $1.75.

Behind the study of comparative religion lies the recognition of the religious instinct itself and the inquiry into its primary origin. None of the old religions of the world has sprung suddenly into being, like the mushroom in the night. Man first feels the impulse to worship and pays homage to his chosen deity; after that he formulates his belief into a religious system. If this analysis be in harmony with the facts involved, the principle of procedure followed by Dr. Matheson in the present volume is altogether philosophical. To explain the origin of religion is, therefore, his first endeavor; but, disbelieving that either fear, superstition, or the sense of dependence are primitive instincts, he cannot trace the religious faculty to these mental states. But, on the other hand, the author holds that the realization of the limitations of personal existence led primitive man to seek the universal cause of all things in the world without. Hence came fetichism; then the worship of pure spirits; then the adoration of that spirit as embodied in outer forms. Yet under the last stage, holds the author, polytheism strictly never existed, but rather what has been termed by Max Müller as henotheism, or a recognition of "a plurality of heavenly objects, but in which the place of honor is occupied by each in turn." On this introductory division of the volume—as well as on the following chapter, in which the writer finds that the idea of incarnation is the common element in all religions—it is not possible to linger. If the author differs with Paley as to the way in which primitive man has reached the notion of a universal cause, and if he varies from other students of historic religions as to the subsequent development of the religious faculty, he has nevertheless declared his personal views in so scholarly, logical, and engaging a way that a stronger putting of the case cannot be reasonably desired. Yet all this is introductory to the consideration of the distinctive features of the different religions of the world. The common element in the religious beliefs of China is regressiveness, or a turning to the past in search of rest; the message of China to the world is, "Go back." In India the different phases of thought unite in the idea of human life; and the message of that ancient land is "the proclamation of the pilgrim's progress." The message in a sense outlines a general experience. "Here, for the first time in history, we have a description of man's spiritual road—a description of the path over which the religious life is bound to travel if it would be a complete and rounded life." Parseeism advocates the dual principle of creation, and was, through Zoroaster, "the first deliberate and systematic testimony given by the Aryan religious consciousness to the existence of sin." As to Greece, her religion was "essentially and distinctively the worship of the hour, and the investiture with reverence of the things amongst which she lived and moved." Rome made "the earliest attempt at religious union." In the mythology of the Teuton we discover features of development. The religion of Egypt apologizes for "what is called an idolatrous worship." The message of Judea to the world is "the power of inwardness in the religious life;" and that of Christianity is reconciliation. But in the message of the latter, suggests the author, the religions of the past are themselves included. Christianity "has found a place for them" in its system "Indian and Greek, Roman and Teuton, Buddhist and Parsee, Egyptian and Chinaman can meet here hand in hand; because in the comprehensive temple of Christian truth there is not only a niche which each may fill, but a niche which, at some stage of its development, must be filled by one and all." So reasons Dr. Matheson. If we have followed to some degree the synoptical method in presenting the contents of his book it has been because his line of thought may thus be presented most clearly to the reader. However the critical student may take issue with him in any of his conclusions, he cannot but be concerned in this new putting of a familiar subject: however unattractive to the casual reader the study of the world's religions has heretofore been, he will not fail to find in the present volume at once an intelligible, worthy, and fascinating portrayal of religious development.

Through Christ to God: A Study in Scientific Theology. By Joseph Agar Beet, D.D. Crown 8vo, pp. 373. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.50.

This book contains thirty-nine lectures given by Dr. Beet to the students of the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Richmond, England, in which he is a professor. He describes these lectures as "first steps in accurate study of systematic doctrinal theology," adapted not solely to theological students, but also to intelligent men and women seeking "to know all they can about the great realities on which rests the Christian hope." And because they embody much original research they commend themselves to the attention of advanced students. The characteristic feature of these lectures is in their purpose to show "that, by a strictly historical and scientific and philosophical method, definite and assured results may be reached touching the unseen foundations of religion." Thus they describe and arrange facts "which cannot be explained by the various forces observed operating in the material world and in human life around and within us, and which therefore reveal the operation of forces other than these." From these facts the underlying principles are deduced, and from these, "still broader principles, with their bearing on the inner and outer life of man." The skillful application of this scientific method to the study of theology gives these lectures a unique character, and a special adaptation to the needs of the Church, in her present conflicts with manifold types of error pretentiously arrayed in garments woven in the looms of "science, falsely so called," and of materialistic philosophies. Dr. Beet is a clear thinker. His ideas stand out with transparent distinctness before his mental eye. Hence his statements are clear-cut, his definitions well expressed. Thus, for example, he defines religion as "such a conception of the unseen as makes for righteousness;" theology as "a branch of human knowledge embracing whatever we know about that unseen which makes for righteousness;" righteousness through faith as the fact that "God receives into his favor all who believe the good news announced by Christ." Belief is "mental rest in an idea; . . . when it has a personal object this rest of mind is derived from and rests upon the word and character of a speaker. It is a voluntary surrender of the whole man to be influenced by that which his intelligence rightly or wrongly believes to be true. . . . The faith through which we obtain justification as Paul understood it is an assurance, resting on the word and promise of God, that God now receives into his favor as heirs of eternal life us who believe the good news of salvation announced by Christ." Evangelical redemption is defined as "the deliverance of sinners from the penalty and power of sin by the costly means of the death of Christ. . . . The propitiation of Christ was not needed to change the mind of God, for the apostles of Christ knew that God's anger is not a vexation with a sinner that needs to be changed, but an unchangeable opposition to sin. From that anger the sinner needs to find escape; he needs a propitiation which will shelter the sinner from the punishment due to his sin. And this we accept as a definition of evangelical propitiation." Dr. Beet rightly, as we judge, regards the death of Christ as necessary for governmental reasons—"to give proof of God's righteousness—to harmonize with his own justice the justification of believers. . . . The need for the death of Christ as the only possible means of man's salvation lay in the justice of God." Thus with sound reasoning and perspicacious definitions Dr. Beet expounds the leading truths of the Gospel. His expositions bring difficult and obscure truths into light sufficient to commend them to the acceptance of candid and intelligent inquiring minds. If they fail to do this it is when, in treating of the mysteries of the incarnation, he attempts to explain our Lord's growth of knowledge and his confession of ignorance of the day of his second coming by supposing that "the eye omniscient, while preserving unimpaired its capacity for infinite perception, was for a time closed, . . . that his divine power and intelligence were for a time dormant." To us this supposition is unthinkable. It is an explanation which does not explain. We prefer to take the facts given in the Gospel as mysteries which, like unnumbered modes of divine action in the natural world, cannot now and possibly never will be brought within the comprehension of human reason. With this one unimportant exception we commend this thoughtful book to all who love "books that are books." The breadth and lucidity of its thoughts, the virility of its style, the soundness of its theological opinions, its deep but subdued religious tone, its exegetical learning, and its scientific method of so expounding old truths that, like novelties, they arrest and hold one's attention, make it a work of rare merit and exceptional value. It ought to command a wide circulation.

Amos: An Essay in Exegesis. By H. G. MITCHELL, Professor in Boston University. Crown 8vo, pp. 209. Boston: N. J. Bartlett & Co.

Professor Mitchell has in this volume furnished a help to the study of the prophecy of Amos for which students of the Old Testament Scriptures will be grateful. Very justly, instead of approving the disparaging estimates of the prophet's style and literary worth made by Jerome and Calmet, he substantially confirms the opinion of Bishop Lowth, who ranked him with "the very chief of the prophets, as almost equal to the greatest in sublimity and magnificence, and in splendor of diction and elegance of expression scarcely inferior to any." The professor treats of this book under three general heads: 1. "Introductory Studies;" 2. "Translation and Comments;" 3. "Supplementary Studies." In the "Introductory Studies" we have a picturesque description of Tekoa, or Tikua, the prophet's home, if not his birthplace; a study of his character, of the peculiarities of his style, and of the influences which affected his development. Next comes the date of his prophecies, which, though uncertain, is with good reason set down at about B. C. 760. A very clear and sufficiently full analysis of his prophecies follows, showing that they began with stormy threats, proceeded to thunderbolts of denunciation, and closed with the sunshine of God's promised mercy. Their total effect was to inspire faith in God. The professor's translation, though independent, is not substantially different from either the Authorized or the Revised Version. Yet certain phrases in those translations which do not clearly express the exact meaning of the prophet's words are modified; as, for example, instead of "I will press you in your place, as a cart presseth that is full of sheaves," we have "I will cause a trembling under you such as a cart that is full of sheaves causeth;" in place of "after the king's mowings," we have "after the king's shearings;" for "threshing instruments of iron" we have "iron-shod sledges;" and instead of "the Lord God," we have "the Lord Jehovah." These and kindred substitutions are doubtless improvements; but where in chapter vii, verses 2 and 5, Amos is made to say, "Lord Jehovah, prithee forgive," and "Lord Jehovah, prithee cease!" in place of "I beseech thee," as in both the Authorized and Revised Versions, one demurs on the score of taste. "Prithee," being a corruption of "I pray thee," can scarcely be accepted as a good modern English word. As it reads in the professor's translation it impresses one as lacking in that reverential spirit which breathes throughout this rhetorically beautiful prophecy. In his "comments" Dr. Mitchell sheds clear light on the words of the prophet. Scholarly exegesis, historical and meteorological information, geographical and topographical descriptions, and the critical judgments of many learned men are judiciously used to explain and illustrate the teaching of the herdsman of Tekoa. In his "Supplementary Studies" the professor inquires whether Amos was or was not acquainted with the first six books of the Old Testament, giving his reasons for the opinion that while his writings contain evidence that he was acquainted with Hebrew history they do not prove that he was acquainted with those books. This opinion the professor's readers will accept if they are in sympathy with the "higher criticism;" if not, they will conclude that the prophet's obvious acquaintance with the history of his people was derived from the Hexateuch. Another topic in these "Supplementary Studies" is the "Theology of Amos," which embraced a grand conception of the character of God, but was less full and explicit in its teachings respecting the character of man. In his final chapter our author treats very suggestively of the relations of Amos to the other prophets, classing him as "one of the greatest" of those inspired men. Taken as a whole, this instructive book must be recognized as a valuable contribution to the list of works which are real helps to Bible students. Pastors may use it profitably, not only in their private study, but especially in conducting adult Bible classes. We therefore commend it heartily, hoping with its scholarly author that it may "help in winning for the prophet Amos the popularity that he deserves."

Four Centuries of Silence; or, From Malachi to Christ. Second Edition. By the Rev. R. A. Redford, M.A., LL.B., Professor of Systematic Theology and Apologetics, New College, London; Author of The Christian's Plea Against Modern Unbelief, etc. 12mo, pp. 258. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

The centuries herein reviewed by Mr. Redford were far from unimportant in Jewish history. That they were a time of silence, so far as message of distinguished prophet or particular manifestation of the divine majesty were concerned, does not detract from their specific value. Like links in the great chain of sacred history they join the eventful dispensation of Israelitish worship to the more eventful dispensation of the Messiah's advent. As such a connecting tie between the old and the new it is clear that every feature belonging to the literature, the social customs, and the religious spirit of these times is of importance. With such a recognition of their worth Mr. Redford has gathered together in compact form most or all of the records that are preserved concerning the Jewish Pontificate, the Septuagint, the Apocrypha, the Sanhedrin, the Jewish sects, the supremacy of the Persian and the Greek nations, the Messianic Expectation, and the Voice in the Wilderness. We must be grateful to the author for the faithful and vivid manner in which he has set these intervening "four centuries of silence" before us. Nor from our standpoint do they seem useless centuries. If they displayed the "evening sky of the Jewish Church," they contained no less "the dawning light" of the later and abiding day of Christianity.

The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. By Dr. DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS. Translated from the Fourth German Edition by GEORGE ELIOT. Second Edition. In one volume. 8vo, pp. 784. New York: Macmillan & Co. Price, cloth, $4.50.

The time has gone by when any particular discussion of this Life of Jesus or any lengthy refutation of its mistaken teachings is in order. To discover the fallacy in the "mythical theory" of Strauss, as to the origin of Christianity, was the labor of a former generation. According to this theory the Gospel records concerning Jesus are fictions, unauthorized by his immediate disciples, which sprung up in the thirty years intervening between his death and the destruction of Jerusalem—a theory which has been termed "an outrage upon common sense." We need not now add to this vigorous characterization. But, while the errors of Strauss have already been sufficiently exposed, it is not unprofitable for the theological student of the present day to possess for himself this work of Strauss, to study its theory in some detail. His personal belief in the authenticity of the gospel records will necessarily be strengthened thereby. The reissue of this Life of Jesus is, therefore, opportune.

PHILOSOPHY, SCIENCE, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

The Interpretation of Nature. By NATHANIEL SOUTHGATE SHALER, Professor of Geology in Harvard University. 16mo, pp. 305. New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Not the least noticeable among the suggestions of this volume is the lesson that the interpretation of nature is an ancient pursuit. Scholars have not come suddenly into the enthusiastic study and explanation of material phenomena. Obedient to an inherent curiosity regarding the processes of nature, men from the primeval times have pressed their inquiries in this sphere of research. The scientific interpretation of nature, according to Professor Shaler, had an Aryan origin and, particularly, a Grecian development. "The scientific motive," he remarks, "is essentially peculiar to one body of folk, the Aryans, and has attained to any considerable development in only one branch of that race, the Greeks and their intellectual descendants, the kindred Europeans. The essential shape of our modern science is Greek. We have inherited this part of our life from the Hellenes even more immediately than we have taken the basis of our spiritual motives from the Hebrew race." From this Hellenic starting-point it is a satisfactory, even if preliminary, thing to trace the history of scientific study through the Roman period, the Dark Ages, and the Renaissance; and the reader will dwell upon this introductory chapter of Professor Shaler's with interest. Thence the transition is logically easy to the succeeding themes of consideration, as announced in the captions: "Critical Points in the Continuity of Natural Phenomena," "The Place of Organic Life in Nature," "The March of the Generations," "The Bond of the Generations," "The Natural History of Sympathy," and "The Immortality of the Soul from the Point of View of Natural Science." To linger upon the weighty discussion of these important matters would altogether transcend the limits of this present notice. Two feelings, however, impress themselves upon the mind of the reader. One of them is that the author speaks from the scientific rather than from the theological standpoint. He writes as a student of nature, and his nomenclature is that of modern scholarship. The other impression is that of the concessive quality of his teaching. He is not so limited in vision that he sees nothing wise or able in the inquiries of theology as to natural phenomena. Both the scientist and the theologian have their place and work. If the province of the one is "the evident and the ponderable," that of the other is to apply the truths afforded by the study of nature "in all that relates to the moral conduct of men." For such a temperate and, as we think, true construction of the relation of science and theology there cannot fail to be a due appreciation.

A Perplexed Philosopher: Being an Examination of Mr. Herbert Spencer's Various Utterances on the Land Question, with Some Incidental References to his Synthetical Philosophy. By HENRY GEORGE. New York: Charles L. Webster & Co. 12mo, pp. 319. Price, $1.

Mr. George figures in this volume as a philosopher who has a grievance. His quondam friend and philosophical brother, Mr. Herbert Spencer, who in past years held the same opinions as himself respecting the alleged wrong involved in the private ownership of land, has been led by further investigations of the subject to change his opinions. Of course Mr. George is much grieved, vexed, perhaps, to lose the support given to his land nationalization theories by so distinguished a philosopher as Mr. Spencer. Hence, instead of congratulating him on his entrance into greater light, he publishes this polemical volume, which aims to convince his disciples that Mr. Spencer has not been led from his former opinions by honest convictions of their falsehood, but by selfish desires and ambitions unworthy of so illustrious a philosopher. How much this volume will contribute to strengthen the faith of Mr. George's adherents in the principle which Mr. Spencer has disavowed it is impossible even to guess. Its appearance would seem to indicate that Mr. George fears that the backsliding of his old friend may lead others to question his theories. His book is somewhat dull reading, and will not add to the number who deny that right of individual ownership in land which is recognized in the tenth commandment, in the division by divine direction of the lands of Palestine among the descendants of Abraham, and in the practice of all civilized nations. To us the individual ownership of land seems necessary to its cultivation, on which its value to sustain human life absolutely depends. If Mr. George were to advocate the limitation of the right of ownership to the necessities of the owner and to the needs of society he would be nearer right than he is at present. As to his disagreement with Mr. Spencer one needs only to remark that the disputes of errorists are precursors of the victories of truth.

Elements of Deductive Logic. By NOAH K. DAVIS, Ph.D., LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Virginia, and Author of The Theory of Thought, etc. 12mo, pp. 208. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, 90 cents.

Logic presupposes not only a thinker but also sufficient time for the formulation of his thought processes into orderly arrangement. Nor does "thought as exercised in scientific pursuits," according to the present author, alone fall within the scope of logical treatment. But thought everywhere and on all subjects—in short, universal thought—has a place in the discussion; or, in other words, "logic explains how any human mind thinks correctly at any time about any thing." Of the present handbook of Dr. Davis on deductive logic it is not necessary to speak at length. Postponing to another volume the treatment of induction, he has furnished an elementary work on the underlying principles of the logical science which, for lucidity and general value, could not be well improved. It is not easy to turn the pages of his book without feeling anew the old impression of the dignity of all thought operation and the elevating influence of its scientific scrutiny.

An Introduction to the Science of Thought. By S. S. HEBBERD. 12mo, pp. 84. Madison, Wis.: Tracy, Gibbs & Co.

This pamphlet is an eloquent exposition of "the simple principle that every perfect thought contains two elements related to each other as cause and effect; and whenever either of these elements is suppressed thought thereby becomes vague, one-sided, fatally defective." Its author traces the distraction and division of human speculations to the nonrecognition of this principle, which, when recognized, he asserts, will furnish "a basis for true theories of science, morality, and art; will explain the course of human civilization, and so provide a genuine philosophy of history." Its ascendency would, its author insists, bring about "a new age of faith, sacrifice, and social order!" Mr. Hebberd wields a facile and able pen, is evidently possessed by his theory, is gifted with a vivid and illusive imagination, and argues enthusiastically for his philosophic gospel. His pamphlet, though it may not command assent, is yet well worth reading, because it is provocative of thought; albeit the reader in closing its pages will probably be disposed to say with Hamlet, that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in human philosophy.

The Making of a Man. By Rev. J. W. Lee, D.D. 16mo, pp. 372. New York: Cassell Publishing Co. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The supremacy of humanity in the material world is the conviction alike of the philosopher and the Christian. We can have no sympathy with the disposition of certain scholars to give man a subordinate place in nature—scholars who assign him with the monkey and baboon "to the order of primates," who make his conscience "the resultant of fear and instinct," who declare his morality to consist of "rules imposed by his own prudence," and who assert that his religion is "determined by the physical conditions which surround his life." Against this position Dr. Lee well protests in the present work. Man was, in truth, the culmination of the divine purpose of the Creator. "He was the realization of an ideal, which gave meaning to the long periods of preparation. As the final expression of the creative process he was at once the interpreter and the interpretation of all that had gone before." The provisions made for man in the natural world therefore become, in view of this appointed superiority, a matter of practical and absorbing interest. As the being upon whom the Creator has conferred the lasting honor of preeminence, man must naturally find those adjustments and conveniences in the external world which go to perpetuate his primacy. Along this line of reflection does the argument of the present volume run. "Man has no deeper and surer impression," declares the author, "than that the world belongs to him and was made for him. It is deepened year by year, too, as he sees the relations he sustains to it increase." Provisions are thus made for his physical, social, intellectual, moral, æsthetic, and spiritual natures—whose detailed description makes up the subject-matter of the present volume. Bread is thus the ministry of nature to man's physical wants, beauty to his æsthetic tastes, and righteousness to his moral nature. In short, the whole complex round of man's needs and desires seems to be remembered in the bountiful supplies of nature. But man, the dominant creature of the material world, has also a tendency for a future existence which the author does well to recognize in his closing chapter on "The Permanence of the Completed Life of Man." Through all mutations the essential man survives. "The personal spirit, by its very nature and tendencies and possibilities, seems to be addressed to another than the tangible, local, and physical realm in which it finds itself while residing in the body. An irrepressible and wide-reaching something in the spirit of each man seems to impel him to triumph over space and time and change. . . . The destruction of a human spirit would register the death of God. It is the direct expression of the spirit of God, and bears his own likeness and image, and has for the guarantee of its permanence the person of the eternal God himself." We have thus, in a most cursory way, noticed the trend of an important book. While it does not lack in scholarly treatment, it is, withal, couched in a style so attractive as to appeal to the tastes of the general reader, and cannot but profit him.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Representative Women of Methodism. By CHARLES WESLEY BUOY, D.D. 12mo, pp. 476. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Burning and shining lights have been multiplying from the days of John the Baptist until now. Nero lit his palace gardens by night with Christians, covered them with pitch, and then drove his chariot down among the blazing saints. It was the only way he found of rejoicing in their light. God lights the ages with his people, clothes them with the garments of salvation and the graces of the Spirit, and so illuminates the dark. They shine as lights in the world. Now and then he enhances the value of the human race by large single installments of merit. The glory of the invisible God is revealed in exemplary and devout lives. Character concretes the grace divine into objective and influential fact. In Dr. Buoy's book six of the rarest of womankind are set before us, three from the English side of the sea: Susannah Wesley, Lady Huntingdon, and Mary Fletcher; three from our side: Katherine Garrettson, Eliza Garrett, and Lucy Webb Hayes. Seldom are lives already familiar represented so clearly and richly. Far from being bare biographies, these are brightly diversified discourses. Such lives as they portray are among the most unanswerable apologetics of Christianity. Beginning with the mother of the Wesleys and closing with the bravest, noblest, and most gracious mistress the White House ever had, they illustrate how fruitful Methodism has been in characters of the most delicate refinement, the finest culture, the fairest beauty, and the amplest influence. We know no volume more perfectly fitted to win intelligent womanhood to love and cherish Methodism. It should be in every college and seminary and home, for the education of such young people as are in danger of imagining that there is anything better than Methodism. If any are inquiring for the best society they can find it inside the covers of Dr. Buoy's book. It is well that these chapters, expanded from a course of popular lectures delivered in 1891 in Philadelphia, went to type to find the larger audience they deserve; and it is fit that the volume is dedicated to Mrs. Ellen H. Simpson, the wife of our sainted bishop.

The Danube, from the Black Forest to the Black Sea. Illustrated by the Author and ALFRED PARSONS. By F. D. MILLET, Author of A Capillary Crime, etc. 12mo, pp. 329. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $2.50.

In that spirit of intelligent exploration which often yields most satisfactory results the three tourists whose names are found in this volume lately made a canoe journey through the European territory indicated. The fact that the route lay through a section not largely frequented by visitors or described by observers gives particular value to the excursion taken. What the travelers saw they saw well. The scenery, the strange industries, and the quaint social customs of the portions of Austria and Turkey through which they passed are in turn recorded for the benefit of the reader. Ratisbon, Passau, Vienna, Pressburg, Budapest, Kalafat, and Widdin, with other places of lesser geographical prominence, are successive stages of the journey, whose beauties or peculiarities give a charm to the journal of adventures. In a sense the work of authorship has been one of collaboration. The book, which would in any case have been of interest from the vivid quality of its descriptions, is made doubly attractive by the illustrations with which it has been embellished. It is calculated to relieve the tedium of the leisure hour.

Abraham Lincoln. Illustrated. By CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN, Author of The Boys of '76, etc. 8vo, pp. 542. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $3.

The romance of Abraham Lincoln has long since become a household story. In fact, so ample a literature on the life and times of the distinguished President has accumulated during the last quarter of a century that it would seem bold to attempt any addition thereto. Yet the personal acquaintance which Mr. Coffin enjoyed with the great leader puts him at an advantage in undertaking the present "sketch," and gives his completed volume an exceptional quality. This association with Mr. Lincoln began on the night succeeding his nomination to the presidency, and continued through the presidential term as late as Mr. Lincoln's visit to Richmond at the close of the war, when the narrator walked with him through the streets of that burning city. With the memories of such a long and familiar knowledge of Mr. Lincoln, and with such an intrinsically heroic character to depict, Mr. Coffin has all the inspirations to good work which come to any biographer. His book is therefore highly realistic. Whoever reads it will find himself transferred in fancy back to the days of the great rebellion, and will live over again the thrilling, feverish, pivotal times of that national crisis. As for him who took so chief a part in the settlement of our public destinies the reader will review his fascinating life-story with an absorption which time does not lessen. That one so lowly born could have reached so high a throne of power, that his promotion was purely providential, and that he was divinely helped in the direction of the vast responsibilities laid upon his shoulders are lessons which repeat themselves in the reading of the present biography, though they have long since found a place among the settled convictions of the historic student. The exquisite pathos of Mr. Lincoln's life likewise stands out in prominence under the portrayal of Mr. Coffin. Sadness tinged the great statesman's soul. Whether in his upward struggle from scenes so homely and prosaic, in his occasional failure to reach the political prizes of his earlier life, or in the crushing burdens that came upon him as the chief magistrate of the nation, a somber shadow hung over his life whose contemplation moves the reader to the most profound emotions. Like many of the great souls of history, Lincoln lived a life that was solitary and sad. But he did not live in vain. More clearly than ever, now that the clouds of war are gone from the sky, does such a biography as the present show the enduring nature of the great President's work. Well was it exclaimed at his deathbed that "he belongs to the ages." Mr. Coffin has written with unusual biographical skill, and has produced a book that, with its attractive illustrations, will charm not only youthful but also older readers.

Ten Years' Digging in Egypt. 1881–1891. With a Map and One Hundred and Sixteen Illustrations. By W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, Author of Pyramids of Gizeh, etc. 12mo, pp. 201. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Price, cloth, $1.50.

Some of the greatest modern triumphs of archæology have been won in the country of the Nile. The many records of the past which have been brought forth out of this crowded mausoleum of the ages have forced a modification of the text-books on history, and will compel a still further remaking of the historic records. An outline of what a single archæologist has accomplished within the past decade fills up the present volume. His story reads like some excursion into the realm of fancy. Egypt is put before us in a new vividness, and, for the time being, the reader must perforce yield himself to the wizard influence of this busy discoverer. Tanis, Naukratis, Daphnæ, Gurob, Medum, and other localities are sufficiently described, and their treasure-yields are indicated. The author's story of his discoveries at Hawara not only suggests the marvelous archæologic remains yet to be found in Egypt, but also sets forth the perplexities and hardships which accompany scientific discovery in that land. The freedom of the book from undue details and scientific terms makes it an attractive one for the ordinary user. It should help to a larger interest in Egyptology on the part of unscientific readers, since "we are only yet on the threshold of understanding the sources of the knowledge, the arts and the culture which we have inherited from a hundred generations."

Harper's Chicago and the World's Fair. The Chapters on the Exposition Both Collated from Official Sources and Approved by the Department of Publicity and Promotion of the World's Columbian Exposition. Illustrated. By JULIAN RALPH. 12mo, pp. 244. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $3.

This volume is one of the forerunners of a large number of publications on the World's Columbian Exposition that will be issued during the current year. The volume of Mr. Ralph, however, enjoys the advantage not only of being among the first in the field, but also of having been written from a personal study at Chicago of the "plans and aims" of the promoters of the Exposition. The book follows a twofold line of treatment. The city of Chicago, as the site of the Exposition, is first appropriately portrayed. Its origin in the "Block House of Dearborn," its phenomenal increase, like the growth of some genie's palace in the night, the methods of its municipal government, its towering architecture, its mammoth dustries, its prominence as a railroad center, and in general the multiform phases of its teeming life are thus duly noticed. If the whole description is couched in superlative terms it is because of the unprecedented growth of this New World metropolis within a short half century, involving the romantic and even the miraculous. From the city of Chicago as it is the transition is natural and easy to the World's Fair as it is to be. Probably all that could be said in anticipation of the buildings which are under construction for the great display, of the diverse exhibits which are intended, and of the large educational benefits that will come to the multitudes of visitors at the Exposition has been included by the author in his volume. His personal visit to Chicago assuredly contributes to the accuracy and perspicuity of his description, while the reproduction of many pictorial illustrations which have previously appeared in Harper's Weekly tends to the completeness and attraction of the volume. It is not a mere guide book to Chicago or the Exposition, but is rather designed "to be read at home and before the Exposition opens." As such a work it has its place and decided value.

The Praise of Paris. Illustrated. By THEODORE CHILD. 8vo, pp. 299. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, ornamented cloth, $2.50.

Many writers before Mr. Child have united in singing the glories of the French capital upon the Seine. In the fourth century it was called by the Emperor Julian "my dear town of Lutetia." In the later centuries, according to our present author, many celebrities have written or spoken the praises of the beautiful city, among them being Goethe, Gibbon, and Montaigne. And yet their commendation is only the praise of every tourist who sees the gorgeous French city and falls a victim to its charms. Obedient to the usual sentiment of admiration, Mr. Child in the present instance has gathered up some of the current phases of the Parisian life for the benefit of the reader. The composition of the French metropolis in its work and its pleasures, its upper and lower strata of social existence, its architecture and its embellishments, its habits of dueling, and its circles of scholarship as found in its famous Institutes, all give color to the picture which moves before us under the direction of Mr. Child. The attractive illustrations and beautiful print of the book add also to its merit. It will have an unusual interest to the reader from the fact of the recent untimely taking off of its gifted author while upon a tour of Asiatic discovery.

Stories from Indian Wigwams and Northern Camp-Fires. By EGERTON RYERSON YOUNG, Author of By Canoe and Dog Train, etc. Small 8vo, pp. 293. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. London: Charles Kelly. Toronto: William Briggs. Price, cloth, $1.25.

With the passage of the years an increasing glamour surrounds the personality of the North American Indian. Since he was the forerunner of the aggressive and achieving European who has now taken his place on the western continent we must naturally feel that interest in the Indian which one has in a predecessor. Striking in his personal characteristics and peculiar in his national practices, his story is an integral part of history and should be preserved. Mr. Young has, therefore, done a needed service in his depiction of the present Indian of the great Northwest. Were the religious feature altogether eliminated from the book it would, nevertheless, retain its value. But the volume is, besides, the story of missionary hardships and successes in the remote regions adjoining Lake Winnipeg. None can rightly read its pages without rejoicing anew in the adaptation of the Gospel to the most diverse nationalities of the globe, and in its power to win victories under arctic skies as well as in tropic lands. Mr. Young has given to the public a volume which for its many admirable qualities should find its place in the library of the Sunday school and the home.

The Story of John G. Paton, Told for Young Folks: or, Thirty Years Among South Sea Cannibals. By the Rev. JAMES PATON, B.A. With Forty-five Full-page Illustrations by JAMES FINNEMORE. 12mo, pp. 397. New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The heroism of modern missionaries is not an uncertain testimony to the truth of the Gospel which they preach. Through their bravery in the face of "perils by the heathen," in which they are not surpassed by the first apostles and martyrs, has the truth grown mightily in India, Africa, China, and all other mission fields of the earth. The instance of John G. Paton is not an exception to this general rule. While in usefulness he has been abundant, in heroic bearing no missionary of the cross since the Gospel went forth from Jerusalem could have surpassed him. The power of consecrated personality, which is certainly needed no less in mission work than in other departments of human activity, seems an uppermost lesson in the present autobiography. Calmly, patiently, sensibly, Mr. Paton goes about his work, and, amid all the trying scenes in the New Hebrides which he describes, stands forth as a tower of strength. Sentiment, romance, and tragedy combine to give charm to the present story of his life. The volume cannot but do good, and all who read it will breathe a more fervent prayer for the divine blessing upon the work in the New Hebrides, as well as in all other harvest fields of the Lord.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Simple Bible Lessons for Little Children. By FREDERICK A. LAING, F.E.I.S., Editor of The Sabbath School Magazine. With an Introduction by the Rev. JAMES STALKER, M.A., D.D. 12mo, pp. 411. New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son. Price, cloth, $1.50.

It is well said in the Introduction to this volume that "perhaps the most difficult of all Christian ministries is that to the very little ones." In the endeavor to make this service easier Mr. Laing has prepared the present series of "Lessons." Some of them are from the Old Testament, and some from the New. All are written in a simple style for the comprehension of youthful hearers. The book seems in many respects well adapted to its designed purpose. We might wish, however, that appropriate illustrations had accompanied the written text.

Seven Great Lights. By Rev. KERR B. TUPPER, D.D., Pastor First Baptist Church, Denver, Author of Robertson's Living Thoughts, etc. With an Introduction by Rev. W. F. McDOWELL, D.D., Chancellor of the University of Denver. 16mo, pp. 188. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

A series of denominational sermons preached by representative ministers of Denver in the church of Dr. Tupper. Luther, Cranmer, Knox, Wesley, Edwards, Campbell, and Spurgeon are the "great lights" whose brilliance illuminates the Churches "with increasing splendor." As is remarked in the "Introduction," the series proceeds in chronological order. Such a course of sermons we cannot but regard as profitable. While denominational beliefs and practices would naturally be justified by their several exponents in their respective discourses, yet sincere and larger Christian unity is also effected. Dr. Tupper did well to arrange this series of sermons, and has done even better in their publication.

Divine Balustrades, and Other Sermons. By ROBERT S. MACARTHUR, D.D. 12mo, pp. 262. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Two discourses on Deut. xxii, 8, give title to the above volume of sermons. Vigorous in thought, attractive in diction, and evangelical in spirit, the whole eighteen discourses which make up the volume well illustrate the sermonic methods of the distinguished divine who delivered them.

The Call of the Cross. Four College Sermons. By Rev. GEORGE D. HERRON, D.D. Introduction by President GEORGE A. GATES. 16mo, pp. 111. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

The author of these discourses speaks like a man who has a mission to the age. He has already become known by other small publications. The same thoughtfulness and earnestness which marked these earlier issues is now evident in this group of "college sermons." The discourses are to be commended.

The Joy of Prayer. By Rev. J. M. ROHDE, A.M. Introduction by Bishop ISAAC W. JOYCE, D.D., LL.D. 16mo, pp. 161. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, 45 cents.

The title of this little hand-book well sets forth its line of thought. It is an earnest and cheerful discussion of a great theme, and will take its place among the many helpful books on devotion which are in print.

The Warwickshire Avon. Notes by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Illustrations by ALFRED PARSONS. 12mo, pp. 144. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, half leather, $2.

To tourists in old England who have visited the historic scenes described by Mr. Quiller-Couch, this book will come with a sense of refreshment. Its mechanical preparation has been most skillfully done, while in the exceeding beauty of its many illustrations nothing is left to be desired. It is a charming volume for a gift-book.

The Pastor Amidst His Flock. By Rev. G. B. WILCOX, D.D., Professor in Chicago Theological Seminary, Author of The Prodigal Son. 12mo, pp. 186. New York: American Tract Society. Price, cloth, $1.

Although pastoral experiences in different denominations are largely diverse, there is much in common among the laborers of Christ that may be written for mutual encouragement. Hence it is that the above book of advices, conducted in the dialogue style, is not of narrow application. Omitting references to denominational polity and practices, its beneficial suggestions, if obeyed, would surely help to develop a sensible, rounded, successful minister of Christ in every pastorate.

Maud Humphrey's Book of Fairy Tales. Quarto. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, in fancy cover, $2.50.

Various nursery tales, like "Cinderella," which never grow old to childhood readers, are here republished with many beautiful colored illustrations. It is an attractive book for fireside use.

Harper's Young People. 1892. Quarto, pp. 872. New York: Harper & Brothers. Fancy cloth.

This is a bound volume of a weekly publication well and favorably known. There is so much in these collected pages that it does not seem that the youth who read them can ask for more. The preservation of the weekly issues of such publications for the young people is accompanied with many advantages.

Field Furings. A Vagrant Chronicle of Earth and Sky. By MARTHA MCCULLOCH WILLIAMS. 16mo, pp. 242. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price cloth, $1.

A pleasant glimpse at some of the phases of nature makes up this little volume. All true lovers of nature will appreciate it.

The Alert Stories. Containing over Two Hundred and Fifty Illustrations. With Stories for Little People. Eight volumes. 16mo. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, per set, $2.

These small volumes are named respectively Careless Maggie, Child Days, Daisy's Pastime, Kitty-Cats, Some Dogs I Know, Sunny Hours, Three Pairs of Eyes, and Town Sparrows. The "little people" of our Sabbath schools will enjoy them.

Miss Millie's Trying. By MARY E. BAMFORD, Author of Father Lambert's Family etc. 16mo, pp. 320. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, 90 cents.

A Tiff with the Tiffins. By FRANCES ISABEL CURRIE. 16mo, pp. 170. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, 50 cents.

The above are two late issues of Sunday school library books for youth. They will be found interesting, safe, and profitable.

LIVING PAPERS.

"A whole library on the evidences of Christianity," is what the Journal and Messenger calls these splendid volumes, because they contain the very latest conclusions of the ripest modern scholarship on living topics of to-day including CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES, DOCTRINES, and ETHICS.

IT IS A PEOPLE'S LIBRARY.

The whole plan of the work makes its valuable contents available to all readers. The array of scholarship represented in its list of authors will captivate the theologian and the preacher, the intelligent layman, now coming to the front as never before as a leader and act upon all questions touching the life and progress of the kingdom of God, but with comparatively little leisure for study, will find these volumes of special interest and value to him.

FIVE POINTS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO THE LAY READER.

1st. Condensation of Thought. The sixty papers will average about sixty pages each, putting within this brief compass what theological students have hitherto been compelled to delve through great folios to acquire.

2d. Size of Volumes. The volumes are only 7½x5 inches in size and three quarters of one inch in thickness. They are thus of convenient size to carry in the hand, or stow away in any small hand bag for reading on the road, or while going to and from business.

3d. Style of Binding. The volumes are plainly but very neatly and substantially bound. They will not soil easily, and can be carried anywhere without being damaged.

4th. Arrangement of Matter. Each paper is preceded by a short analysis of the argument which it contains, while full marginal references wonderfully assist the mind to follow the writer and fully grasp his thought. Each paper is complete in itself, so that the complete argument can be covered in one brief reading.

5th. Price of Set. Last, but not least by any means, the price is such as to bring this invaluable library of Christian thought within the reach of all.

The March of Methodism

FROM EPWORTH AROUND THE GLOBE.

By JAMES McGEE.

"With my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands." So Jacob, and so might say nineteenth-century Methodism. What a wonderful tale is hers of its journeyings! Men will never weary telling it over. In this book a layman takes up the task. It is not a narrative of incidents so much as an orderly, succinct tracing the development of a great religious movement. It will aid in familiarizing [illegible] with the principal features of our Church history. It is [illegible] —Pacific Christian Advocate.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

By JOHN MILEY, D.D., LL.D.

Note this interesting array of

PRESS CRITIQUES.

Illustrated Christian Weekly.

"We have been impressed with the ability and fairness with which the subjects discussed in this volume have been handled. It was a great, but not unexpected pleasure to find that Dr. Miley was sound in the faith upon the doctrines 'in the air' at the present time—inermat inspiration, the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, miracles, prophecy, the incarnation and atonement of Jesus Christ, and the kindred topics."

Public Opinion.

"The author shows that he has thought long and patiently upon all the relations of his subject, and has read widely in all directions. The excellences of the work are many and varied. It will assist many a reader to a clearer discrimination in theological thinking."

New York Observer.

"The author has produced a work of great value. It is written in a lucid and vigorous style, in an excellent spirit, and with a thorough acquaintance with the literature of the subject."

California Christian Advocate.

"The entire work is clearly thought out and plainly stated. We consider the work a very decided acquisition to theological science, and commend it to the attention of all students of the Bible."

Nashville Christian Advocate.

"We unhesitatingly indorse the volume as one of great value, a capital addition to the library of any preacher or any thoughtful layman."

Christian Guardian (Canada).

"The distinguishing feature of this volume which gives it a special value above our standard Methodist theological works is that it discusses all the great questions of Christian theology from a modern standpoint, and with the fullest knowledge of the theories and objections that are current at the present time."

Central Christian Advocate.

"Dr. Miley's Systematic Theology bids fair to occupy a position in literature second to none of the great productions which have enriched the educational forces of the Christian Church."

New York Christian Advocate.

"Exact expression is a familiar trait in Dr. Miley's style. Whatever is lost in fervor and flexibility is more than made up by the admirable clearness of method and statement. We may not agree with Dr. Miley, but it is not easy to misunderstand him. To this must be added another, the laudable habit of bringing out his authorities and giving them a fair introduction to his readers."

Lutheran Quarterly.

"Of the volumes of the Biblical and Theological Library, Dr. Miley was chosen to write on 'Systematic Theology.' The first volume justifies the wisdom of his selection, and raises the expectation that the author will at once be ranked with the leading theologians of the country."

Western Christian Advocate.

"The spirit of candor and fairness that obtains throughout prepossesses one in favor of the author. We commend the book to our readers, and especially to the younger ministers in our Church, who are seeking to shape their beliefs into a system that shall be rational, consistent, and scriptural."

ART. I.—CHARLES THE GREAT—HIS RELATION TO THE CHURCH.

THE reign of the Emperor Charles the Great was of such influence upon the interests of the Church that, while it began simultaneously with the commencement of the mediæval period, it did not terminate with the latter, but has reached into modern history and affected the relations of Church and State in Europe down to the present century. He is one of the permanent characters in history. When, in the year 1165, the mortuary chapel in the great cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, the city of his love and death, was opened for the second time in three hundred and fifty-one years, the body of the great ruler whom Paschal III had canonized was found sitting erect as a living monarch, clad in his imperial robes, with scepter in hand, the sword "Joyeuse" at his side, and the Frankish crown upon his fleshless brow. And the German conception of the founder and organizer of Teutonic greatness has ever been in harmony with this circumstance—not as of the dead, but of the living, Karl der Grosse, Charles the Great.

On the death of his father Pepin, in the year 768, he ascended the throne as inheritor of Austrasia, Neustria, and other portions of the eastern part of the Frankish empire, while his brother Carloman ruled over France and a large part of Germany, which constituted the western part of the empire. Carloman dying in 771, Charles took possession of the whole without regard to the rights of his deceased brother's family. From the moment of his assumption of supreme control he established a policy from which he never departed, and to which he made all his prerogatives and measures subservient. This was the combination of the theocratical idea with the monarchical. While he regarded himself as the civil ruler his notion of his imperial functions extended to the sphere of religion and theology, and he felt that so far as these related to his government he was of right their supervisor and disposer. Taking the kings of Israel and Judah, and not the Roman rulers, as his prototypes, he imagined that he was rather a David, a Hezekiah, or a Josiah than a Cæsar Augustus or even a Constantine.

But his attitude toward the Church and its spiritual head was friendly, nay, even fraternal. Never has a monarch, with, perhaps, the exception of Queen Elizabeth of England, been at once more decided in personal convictions and yet more wise in concessions in the proper quarters and in the supreme moment. Toward the pope he acted with such unfailing respect and consideration that it seemed as if he were claiming nothing for himself, and yet all the while he was receiving from the pope such boons as strengthened his hold at once upon his subjects and the Church. Never have two opposing players solved with greater adroitness the problem of ever winning the same game than did Charles the Great and Leo III. Each gave what he could dispense with, while each received what was necessary to his personal interests. Charles's motto, "The Church teaches, but the emperor defends and increases," was as much the pope's as his own, while no papal ear before the time of Hildebrand could be offended by the Frankish ruler's candid statement to Leo III of their relations: "It is my bounden duty, by the help of the divine compassion, everywhere to defend outwardly by arms the holy Church of Christ against every attack of the heathen and every devastation caused by unbelievers, and inwardly to defend it by the recognition of the general faith. But it is your duty, holy father, to raise your hands to God as Moses did and to support my military service by your prayers."

This intimate relation between Charles the Great and the papacy was not altogether a novelty, but was an intensification of what had already obtained between the Frankish imperial house and the immediate predecessors of Leo III. A common interest had drawn these together even before the birth of Charles though, later, this alliance assumed a much wider scope and more attractive forms. Pope Zachary, by causing Pepin le Bref to be anointed as King of the Franks—whether by Boniface or not is not known—placed the Carolingian dynasty, of which Pepin was the founder, under perpetual obligation to the papacy. And it was an obligation which was promptly acknowledged and, with excellent memory, carried into practical effect. The Greek emperors were holding their possessions in Italy against the Lombards with a loose hand, and the popes, unable to secure from abroad proper protection against the devastations of the Lombards, implored the help of the Frankish rulers. Gregory III besought Charles Martel in vain to come to his aid against Luitprand, the King of the Lombards. According to the Lombard historian this ruler was a chaste, beneficent, and liberal-minded man.* Subsequently Stephen II proceeded on a personal visit to Pepin, at that time at the palace of Pontyon, in France, where he was treated with every mark of respect and gained the object of his laborious and hazardous journey, namely, the promise of the King of the Franks to defend him against the new Lombard leader, Astolph, who had crossed the confines of the exarchate, seized Ravenna, and besieged Rome. Having far less respect for the religious feelings of his enemies than Luitprand, Astolph dug up the dead bodies of the Roman saints that he might carry them off, not, it is true, as a mark of scorn, but for tutelary deities in his own Lombardy. Pepin defeated Astolph, and the latter promptly surrendered the whole of the contested territory to his conqueror. The Byzantine empire, to which it had belonged ever since the reign of Justinian, and which had ruled it by exarchs, sent ambassadors to demand its restitution—a requisition which Pepin refused on the ground that his sole object in the war was veneration for St. Peter.

Pepin, claiming the prerogative of the conqueror, gave the Pope the entire territory of the exarchate, the Pentapolis (that is, the coast region extending from Rimini to Ancona), and the city of Comiaclum.† Pepin made the pope the patrician of the exarchate, and himself the patrician of Rome.* The pope willingly accepted the boon without seeming to spend a thought upon the fact that it was an integral part of the Byzantine empire.† The district thus formally transferred to the papacy was the first temporal possession of the popes of Rome, the founding of the States of the Church. The gift was made and accepted in defiance of all right; was later confirmed and extended in the same spirit; became the seed of innumerable ills to Christendom; and, after an existence of over eleven centuries, has at last come to an end in the present generation by the formal entrance of Victor Emmanuel into Rome and the adoption of the city as the capital of the kingdom amid the rejoicings of the long-enslaved people.

The donation to the papacy became seriously endangered subsequently to the death of Pepin by alliances between the Lombards and the Carlolingian dynasties. Bertha, whose sons, Carloman and Charles, were the joint rulers of the Frankish and Paul I, we learn that the territory comprised the cities of Faventia, Imola, and Ferraria, with their marches and the lands and forests, Auximum, Ancona, and Numana, with their environs, and Bononia so far as its limits extended. According to Baronius the region was much more extensive, comprising the cities of Ravenna, Ariminum, Pisaurum, Fanum, Cesena, Senogallia, Æsium, Forum Pompilii, Forum Livii cum Castro Sussubio, Mons Feretri, Acerragium, Mons Lucari, Serra Castellum sancti Mariani (Marini), Bobium, Urbinum, Callium, Luceoli, Eugubium, Comiaclum, and Narnia. Others make the donation still larger. The entire territory was about one hundred and fifty miles long and from sixty to eighty broad, extending back to the Apennines. Compare Wiltsch, Geography and Statistics of the Church, vol. i, p. 264.

* The patriciate, a dignity instituted by Constantine, was bestowed for life. The Patricius Romæ was properly governor of Rome, but could hold subordinate offices, and had the authority of a patricius. German kings received the title from emperors.—Gieseler, Church History, vol. ii, p. 35, note 11. The Franciscan Pagi makes the patrician a lieutenant of the Church rather than of the emperor. On the title and authority of this office compare Ducange (Gloss. Lat., tom. v, pp. 149–151); Pagi (Critica, A. D. 740, No. 6–11); Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom. vi, pp. 308–329); and St. Mare (Abrigé Chronologique de l'Italie, tome i, pp. 379–382).

† It is not quite clear how Stephen himself eluded the claims of the Greek emperor—probably through the emperor's heresy. In Stephen's letter of thanks for his deliverance to the King of the Franks he desires to know what answer has been given to the silentiary commissioned to assert the rights of his master. He reminds Pepin that he must protect the Catholic Church against pestilent wickedness (malitia, no doubt the iconoclastic opinions of the emperor), and keep property secure (omnia proprietatis sue).—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, vol. ii, p. 427.

empire, sought to strengthen their power by a combination with the Lombard kings, while, on the other hand, Desiderius, the new Lombard sovereign, successor to Astolph, was desirous of propping up, by similar alliances, his sovereignty, which for twenty years had been languishing between life and death.* His son Adelchis was betrothed to Giesela, the sister of the Frankish brothers, while Charles divorced his own wife, whose name is not preserved by history, to marry Hermingard, the daughter of the Lombard king. The papal possessions were now in great danger, according to all appearance, and Stephen III was not slow in remonstrating against such an iniquitous alliance in such language as Milman says is "hardly to be equaled in pontifical diplomacy." The pope protested as follows:

> The devil alone could have suggested such a connection. That the noble, the generous race of the Franks, the most ancient in the world, should ally itself with the fetid brood of the Lombards, a brood hardly reckoned human, and who have introduced the leprosy into the land! What could be worse than this abominable and detestable contagion?

It was not on moral grounds, but on grounds of mere papal interest, that the remonstrance was made, as may be seen in every word. Charles, however, whose empire was still divided with his brother, had policy in view, for, in case of conflict with Carloman, he could reasonably expect the aid of the Lombards. So soon as his interests permitted he divorced Hermingard, sent her back to her father's court, and took to wife Hildegard, a Swabian princess. Carloman, who died in 771, left two sons, but their rights were ignored, and Charles became sole ruler over the Frankish empire. The old relations with the papacy, never interrupted, were once more friendly even to the public eye.

Desiderius, stung by the wrong done his daughter, excited by the threatening attitude of Charles, and espousing the cause of the two disinherited sons of Carloman, appealed for redress to Adrian I, the successor in the papacy to Stephen III, and invited a visit from him with the understanding that he should anoint Carloman's sons as Frankish kings. This being declined and the pope refusing to dissolve his alliance with Charles, the Lombard king invaded his dominions and possessed himself of the territory acquired by Pepin. He sacked some cities of the Romagna, stripped the country of its wealth, perpetrated a massacre in the Tuscan town of Blera, and marched toward Rome. Adrian I appealed to Charles for help. The response was prompt and direct. The first measure was pacific, in the double form of a request that Desiderius surrender to the pope the territory which he had captured, but receive a large sum of money as an equivalent. Desiderius evaded any action, thinking that Charles was too much engaged with the Saxons in the north and with the consolidation of his own territory to follow up his verbal propositions by forcible measures. Here he mistook the temper of the Frankish ruler. Charles, with that promptness which characterized all his movements, held a council of war in Geneva, March, 773, and then, dividing his army into two bodies, led the one himself over the Mont Cenis pass of the Alps and gave the other in charge of his uncle Bernhard, who led it over the Mont St. Bernard pass. The Alps on the north and the strong walls of the Lombard capital, Pavia, were the defenses of Desiderius; but Charles, though suffering a temporary defeat by the troops of Adelchis, the son of Desiderius, reached Pavia and began the siege of the city. The poet Longfellow, in his "Tales of a Wayside Inn," draws a beautiful picture of the terror which the hosts of Charles the Great inspired as the Lombard king saw them approach from the southern declivity of the Alps. Desiderius, standing upon a Pavian tower with Olger, the Dane, who had passed his youth as a hostage at the Frankish court, is represented as asking which is Charles as often as each new body of troops comes into view.

And Olger said:
"When you behold the harvests in the fields
Shaking with fear, the Po and the Ticino
Lashing the city walls with iron waves,
Then may you know that Charlemagne is come."
And even as he spake, in the northwest,
Lo! there uprose a black and threatening cloud,
Out of whose bosom flashed the light of arms
Upon the people pent up in the city;
A light more terrible than any darkness;
And Charlemagne appeared—a man of iron!
His helmet was of iron, and his gloves
Of iron, and his breastplate and his greaves

And tassets were of iron, and his shield.
In his left hand he held an iron spear,
In his right hand his sword invincible.
The horse he rode on had the strength of iron,
And color of iron. All who went before him,
Beside him, and behind him—his whole host—
Were armed with iron, and their hearts within them
Were stronger than the armor that they wore.
The fields and all the roads were filled with iron,
And points of iron glistened in the sun
And shed a terror through the city streets.
This at a single glance Olger the Dane
Saw from the tower, and, turning to the king,
Exclaimed in haste: "Behold! this is the man
You looked for with such eagerness!" and then Fell as one dead at Desiderio's feet.

Charles immediately became master of all northern Italy except the cities of Pavia and Verona, which bravely resisted, but whose submission could only be a question of time. Leaving sufficient troops to continue the siege of Pavia, he proceeded in the holy week of 774 to Rome to confer and receive such honors as would cement anew the union between his dynasty and the papacy, or, if the Frankish annalist, Eginhard, be reliable, "to pray at St. Peter's tomb." His approach to the city was signalized by the rejoicings of the pope, the clergy, and all the inhabitants. Thirty thousand citizens, with the senate, the nobility, and the school children, received him with flying colors, crosses, branches of palm and olive, and rapturous shouts. The conqueror dismounted on seeing the cross; walked with his warriors, nobles, and courtiers through the city to the steps of the Vatican; on his knees climbed the steps of St. Peter's, kissing them as he ascended, and at the top was received by the pope with affectionate embraces. They then proceeded together into the crypt where St. Peter's body is claimed by pious Romanists to lie, and there swore to each other indissoluble fraternity. On Wednesday, April 6, 774, he renewed, by virtue of his right as conqueror, his father's territorial donation to the papacy, and, to give the act peculiar solemnity, laid the document on the altar of St. Peter. This record, so important to papal interests, has long since disappeared, but its conditions are conceded to have been the termination of all claims of the Greek empire on the exarchate, and the confirmation and enlargement of the donation of Pepin.* Whether the gift was without limitation, or only a formal and feudal tenure, under certain circumstances reversible to the Frankish empire, has never been fully decided.† However this may be, the territory before long was universally conceded to be the unconditional property of the papacy, and was accordingly so governed, the popes assuming the dignity and demanding the recognitions of temporal sovereigns, the city of Rome alone sustaining a measure of independent government. The revenues, both ecclesiastical and civil, flowed into the papal treasury.

Charles returned to Pavia and brought the siege to a triumphant close. Desiderius presented himself as a submissive penitent at the conqueror's camp, and Charles, after the usual rejoicings and distribution of rewards to his soldiers, took with him the Lombard king and his wife, who ended their days in the cloister of Corby, while their son Adelchis escaped to Constantinople, where he hoped to regain the lost throne. Thus ended, as an independent power, the Lombard kingdom, which had been founded by Alboin on the banks of the Po; and Charles took to himself, in the years 774 and 775, the title of "King of the Lombards and Patrician of Rome." ‡

There were two more attempts to revive the Lombard kingdom by the arrest of the united power of the papacy and the Frankish ruler. A Lombard league, with Arigiso, the son-in-law of Desiderius, at its head, gained strength by the patronage of the Greek ruler and the schemes of Adelchis, and threatened to restore the old condition of things. But Charles the Great responded to the importunity of Adrian I, and, crossing the

* Protestant writers, and some Roman Catholics, claim, and with excellent grounds, that the donation was an enlargement of Pepin's. Wiltsch, the best authority on ecclesiastical geography, says: "Whether Charlemagne merely confirmed the Romish see in its former possessions, as some writers assume, or whether he added new ones to them, is a matter which, in my opinion, ought not to raise the slightest doubt, as the words of Adrian I, in his first and thirteenth letters to Charlemagne, speak most distinctly of cities of Tuscia, of Spoleto, Beneventum, Corsica, and Sabina."—Geography and Statistics of the Church. vol. i, p. 265.

† For a careful examination of this question, with the views of conflicting writers, comp. Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, vol. i, pp. 276, 277.

‡ Döllinger says: "Charlemagne never called himself King of Italy, but only King of the Lombards, but he was really King of Italy."—Münch. Hist. Jahrb. 1865, p. 329.

Alps again, subdued the foe, took as hostages the two sons of Arigiso, and required an annual tribute of seven thousand pieces of gold. The second struggle was the vain effort of Adelchis, who, while commanding a Greek force, which had been fitted out by the direct order of Constantine, the Greek emperor, was deserted by his men and compelled to flee for safety.

Charles had already made three visits to Rome. Of the first, in 774, with its bearing on the future territorial possessions of the papacy, we have already spoken. The second and third, in the years 781 and 787, were hardly of less moment, each being characterized by great benefactions "for the good of his soul," and by equally great concessions from the pope. But the visit of the year 800 was by far the most significant.

Pope Adrian I, after a long reign of twenty-four years, had died in 795, and was succeeded by Leo III, whose election was a great surprise to the people and aroused a very strong opposition. He continued toward Charles the Great the friendly policy of his predecessor, and was prompt in sending to him as the recognized Patrician of Rome the standard of the city and the keys of both the city and the tomb of St. Peter. The hostility to Leo III culminated in the fourth year of his reign, on the ground of alleged irregularities and crimes, in the form of an attack by a band of armed men, who attempted to mutilate him, and only left him when life was nearly extinct. The pope was rescued, however, and finally recovered. His reign was nevertheless in danger; and while he had the sympathy of many there were others who believed him a great offender. The presence and aid of Charles the Great were loudly called for in Rome; but the Frankish ruler, who, at that time was holding his court in the German city of Paderborn, invited the pope, then a fugitive in Spoleto, to make him a visit. The reception was worthy of both host and guest. There were great rejoicings and much feasting. Each manifested to the other the recognitions becoming his official dignities. During the festivities charges against Leo III, in the name of the Roman people—quæ a populo Romano ei objiciebantur, as Eginhard relates—were preferred to Charles, who postponed all final adjudication until he might himself visit Rome. Leo III, attended by an escort of two archbishops, five bishops, and five counts, returned to Rome, not only without opposition, but amid general rejoicings, for it was clear to all that he had the sympathy of Charles, and would most likely profit by his future decision. It seems that Charles had some object in view in starting for Italy far more important than a mere quarrel of the pope with his rivals and enemies. He seems to have surrounded every movement with an air of unusual solemnity, and to have proceeded with a slowness quite new to him. He went first to Rouen and then to the city of Tours, already renowned in Carolingian history, where he worshiped at the shrine of St. Martin and received at the hands of Alcuin, his faithful friend, a copy of the Bible, with corrections by the learned abbot himself. He thence again crossed France to the Rhine and held a diet at Mayence. It was only in the following year, 800, and toward the end of it, that he went southward toward Rome. He was met by Leo III at Nomento, where they took breakfast together and the most cordial salutations were exchanged. Then the pope returned to the city, that he might give official sanction to the popular demonstration. On the next day, November 24, Leo III, surrounded by a great array of clergy, received him with all the honors due a king and conqueror amid the singing of psalms and general rejoicings. For seven days the Frankish ruler, acting the part of judge, and surrounded by the clergy from far and near, the Roman civil dignitaries, and his own Frankish counselors and chiefs, held a solemn synod in St. Peter's Church. The two plaintiffs, Paschalis and Campulus, were requested to prove their charges against Leo III. They were silent, only excusing themselves on the ground of reverence for the office rather than the person of the pope.* Charles rendered his decision, which could only be favorable to Leo III, whereupon the latter made a public declaration of his innocence in the following language:

I, Leo, pontiff of the Holy Roman Church, being subject to no judgment, under no compulsion, of my own free will, in your presence, before God, who reads the conscience, and his angels, and the blessed apostle Peter, in whose presence we stand, declare myself not guilty of the charges made against me. I have never perpetrated, nor commanded to be perpetrated, the wicked deeds of which I had been accused. This I call God to witness, whose judgment we must all undergo; and this I do, bound by no law, nor wishing to impose this custom on my successors or on my brother bishops, but that I may altogether relieve you from any unjust suspicions against myself.

* According to the Book of the Popes, they said: "We do not venture to condemn the apostolic see, the head of all the Churches of God, for by it and its representatives we shall all be judged; but it shall be judged by no man."

There was now performed an act toward which both the victories of Charles the Great and the relations of the papacy to the Carolingian dynasty had been steadily tending for years, and which was destined to affect alike the ecclesiastical and secular history of the civilized world down to modern times. It was on Christmas Day, 800, or, according to the reckoning then in use in the West, the first day of the year 801. Charles, the members of his great court, the nobility of Rome, a multitude of private citizens, and the clergy from Italy and distant parts of the known world were present in St. Peter's, and the now exculpated Leo III performed in person the high mass in commemoration of the nativity of the Redeemer. The scene was one of great splendor, and such as Rome, wont to be splendid alike in her miseries and her joys, had not witnessed since the days of the Cæsars. The pope's voice fell; its cadences died away in the distant recesses of St. Peter's, and the vast multitude were mute and motionless. Amid the pause Leo III advanced toward his royal visitor, bearing a magnificent crown, which he placed upon Charles's head, saying: "Life and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned by God the great and pacific emperor!"* The multitude shouted their acclamations, and the pope, who was the first to bow the knee as subject to the emperor, concluded his act by anointing Charles, and then his son Pepin, with the holy oil of imperial consecration.

What, now, was the meaning of this papal conferral of imperial dignities? Far more than the outward circumstances, brilliant as they were, would seem to indicate. Charles affected to be surprised, and Eginhard, his secretary, wrote that the displeasure of the Frankish monarch at the act was very great, and that such a desecration of the place and the occasion would not have been tolerated if he had known of the pope's design; nevertheless, that he bore the contumacy "with great patience."†

The affair was, in all probability, a fine piece of stage effect. Never was a public surprise more carefully prearranged. Without doubt it had been adroitly concerted over the wineeups at Paderborn; for every step that the king and pope had taken since the papal visit to Germany had been tending that way, and is only explicable by the consummation in St. Peter's. It was the climax of tedious, careful, unwearied good management on both sides.

The coronation of Charles the Great by Leo III was, on the one hand, an affair of unblushing arrogance in the pope, for it claimed the necessity as well as right of papal consecration to imperial honors; but then, on the other, it was the selection and endowment, with all the traditional sanctities of the Church, of one man, with his family after him, as the fit and legitimate successors to the throne of the Cæsars. It is difficult to say which, King or Pope, was the greater gainer by the act. Both profited beyond computation; and yet the historian is seldom so fortunate in tracing evils to a positive and direct source as in ascribing the oppressions of the papal see, the arrogation of rights never contemplated in the early Church to spiritual guides, gross immorality in both clergy and laity, and all this for many centuries, to the coronation of Charles the Great, and the anointing which immediately followed, at the hands of Leo III. The new emperor, in recognition of his changed relation, laid aside his barbarian costume and clad himself in the tunic, chlamys, and sandals of the Roman.* The whole Western Empire was now under one mighty ruler, while the papacy, with Rome as the ecclesiastical metropolis of Latin Christendom, was supplied with complete and perpetual guaranties to territorial ownership. The bonds of emperor and pope were now intimate as never before; and as Leo III gave the new-crowned Charles his final embrace and lost sight of his splendid escort behind the outlying hills of the Campagna, each, for himself and his successors, entered upon a different career, and a new chapter in mediæval history and European civilization was introduced.

Art. II.—THE TRUE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO PETER.

There is no denying the existence of a "higher criticism" in the study of the Bible. Some order of composition, some facts relating to authorship, date, and revision must be true. To ascertain the real order and the genuine facts is a legitimate aim of broad and sound scholarship. At some point of intellectual development in the Church these endeavors are natural, and while they may excite apprehensions as to the popular effect of such study they cannot be successfully opposed. Real harm may be done to the minds of persons unprepared for any change of views from the chaotic but traditional opinions that have long prevailed. In the progress of these investigations it would be singular if many false theories are not proposed before the correct one finally appears. But when the correct view comes to light we may reasonably expect that it will so meet all the demands of the situation as to strengthen faith in the authority of the Bible and tend greatly to the advantage of Christianity and true religion.

The center of interest in the higher criticism of the sacred Scriptures is naturally found in the four gospels, as containing the history of Him who is the fulfillment of the Old Testament and the agent of the new covenant between God and man. Right here, therefore, is where the battle of the critics has waged most fiercely, and where a multitude of diverse and conflicting theories have been propounded, without as yet achieving any clear and well-defined result. However, with the exception of Baur and his school, who seem to be seeking anything else than to establish the truth, most critical students and commentators acknowledge at least an apostolic basis of testimony, whether written or oral, as the foundation of the gospels, only leaving open the question as to when and how these four books came to be in their present form. One class of these, led by Eichhorn and Marsh, assume that there must have been certain original documents, now lost, from which our present gospels were composed. But, as this hypothesis only relieves one set of difficulties by introducing another set not less formidable, it may be passed by as unsatisfactory. A second class of critics have professed to find that some one of the first three is the basis of the other two synoptical gospels; but, unfortunately, they are not agreed as to which gospel fully meets the required conditions. Yet, however, the more recent trend of opinion appears to be decidedly in favor of Mark as the true original. This view, first proposed by Herder, has been supported by such scholars as Weisse, Ewald, Lachmann, Renss, Ritschl, Meyer, and lately by Professor Wendt, of Heidelberg. Some of the grounds for this opinion are quite obvious. For instance, it is found that all but about twenty-four verses of Mark are paralleled in the history as given by Matthew and Luke. True, this can be accounted for by supposing that Mark simply compiled his gospel by collecting facts from the other two. But the abundant and graphic details, the evident touches of nature, the irregular yet strong arrangement of the history, all seem to give this gospel the stamp of independence, if not of special originality, as compared with its cowitnesses. We shall examine this point more minutely a little farther on, for here we must again pause to meet another serious obstacle.

The voice of antiquity, it is said, unanimously assigns the first place to Matthew, and this puts a tangle in all our attempts at solving the problem. Besides, the shorter gospel is unanimously attributed to Mark, and he is said to have written it by direction of the apostle Peter while at Rome, perhaps about the year A. D. 62, at the very earliest. And, as many contend, this gospel contains evidence in its language, style, and scope that it was intended for Gentile Christians. Now, if anything can be taken as a settled principle of higher criticism, it is that historical testimonies as to authorship and canonicity are of less weight than the evidence of internal consistency and the general color and drift of the book. And we are confident that by further searching the internal evidence our perplexities will yet be solved and the true sequence of the gospels clearly shown. We have recently, in our casual reading, struck upon a clew which appears to be in such harmony with the known facts, and also to introduce such an order of logical connection between the gospels, that we wonder it has not been noticed before; yet we are unable to find it expressed in any of the critical works at our hand.* Our new idea is, essentially, that the gospel according to Mark contains palpable traces of having been originally composed for Galileans. Let us first look at Galilee, then at the gospel.

*The nearest approach that we can find to this hypothesis is that of Köstlin, but we are unable to ascertain exactly what his view was.

Galilee and its people were peculiarly situated with respect to the common hope of Israel and the career of Jesus of Nazareth. The country or province was a part of the ancient territory belonging to the twelve tribes. Its people were mostly of the same blood, spoke the same language, and cherished the same religious ideas as those of southern Palestine; but they were separated by the intervening district of the Samaritans from Judea and Jerusalem, the traditional seat of theocratic institutions and national worship. Unlike the scattered communities of the dispersion among the Gentiles in Egypt, Asia Minor, Rome, and elsewhere, they were not affected by the distant contemplation of the land of their fathers, nor compelled by religious isolation to contrast sharply their own creed and customs with those of the wealthy and cultured heathen, so as to feel a sense of peculiar attachment to Jerusalem. On the contrary, the partial separation of Galilee from Judea was a circumstance to cause some conflict of interests between the two sections, more or less, similar to that which anciently existed between Judah and Israel. As related to the temple, the great feasts, the priesthood, and the rabbinical schools, the situation of the Galileans was, in short, provincial. They were not in immediate possession of the sacred institutions nor under the direct influence of the spirit of Judaism as developed at Jerusalem. They could not go up regularly to the great feasts, and in doing so they were recognized by their dialect as "country cousins" from Galilee. See Matt. xxvi, 73, and Luke xxii, 59. Yet Galilee was too large, too populous and wealthy and proud, to meekly admit all the superior pretensions of her southern sister. In the time of Christ she enjoyed the dignity of a separate government, which was amply justified by her resources. Besides, being less amenable to the stricter Jewish sentiment and customs, the Galileans were probably influenced by the presence of a considerable foreign element in their midst. Some Romans there doubtless were, at least a military force (Matt. viii, 5, and Luke vii, 2). We are informed by Josephus that Greeks dwelt in the cities of Galilee,* and Strabo says that in his time, shortly before Christ, it was largely inhabited by Phœnicians, Syrians, and Arabs. The result of this would be a more kindly regard for all men, regardless of nationality, and a religious sentiment less hampered by ceremonies or traditional prejudices.

It was here in Galilee, in this favorable religious soil, that Jesus of Nazareth was reared to manhood, and among this people he spent nearly nine tenths of his active ministry. Here were his relations, his friends, and his acquaintances, and here he selected his apostles and made most of his converts. But in view of the fact that Jesus closed his ministry at Jerusalem, and that after his departure the infant Church was formed, by his command, at that city instead of some city in Galilee, nothing is more natural than that the people of Galilee, disciples and all others, should desire some authoritative statement of the particulars concerning his sufferings and death at Jerusalem and of his resurrection. To such an account would naturally be prefixed some general narration of his career and preaching in Galilee for those who had only been fortunate enough to have seen the Saviour once or twice or to have heard a few fragments of his doctrines. In no other place on the earth was there such a demand for further information concerning Jesus for the first few years after his departure from this world.

That this desire was neither small nor prompted wholly by vain curiosity is shown from the early establishment and growth of the Church among the Galileans, and this was without any special help from the presence and labors of the twelve apostles. We read in the Acts that they, together with many other believers, continued at Jerusalem, preaching the word and baptizing thousands of converts, until "the persecution that arose about Stephen." The length of this time is not clearly given, but enough is reported to show that it must have been several weeks or months, or more likely much longer. Then the disciples "were scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles" (viii, 1), who still remained at Jerusalem for a season. But about three years later, after Paul's conversion and return from Arabia, we read of churches in "Judea and Galilee and Samaria" as existing in a most prosperous state (ix, 31).

Then, if not before, Galilee was ready for an authorized history of Jesus's ministry, including his sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension in Judea. Such a document would be desired and necessary to the instruction and edification of believers, especially in the absence of the apostles. Is it reasonable to think that such a demand would be met? We think so. It seems inevitable. For the sake of truth the apostles would even be compelled to send out some authorized story of their Master's life, a primitive gospel. Not that they took corporate action upon the subject, but the work must be done by one of their number. And who so likely to prepare that account as their recognized spokesman, the first confessor of Jesus's divinity, his defender in the garden of Gethsemane, the foremost witness and speaker on the day of Pentecost? Moreover, we read that at this very time Peter was traveling "throughout all quarters," and he would not have failed to visit Galilee (ix, 32) and personally learn the need of a history of his Master.

And here we may mention again that, although tradition is a unit in making Peter the original authority for Mark's gospel, yet the earliest writers totally disagree as to how Mark received the facts from Peter. It is only known that Mark published the gospel at Rome about the time of the apostle's martyrdom. May not Peter have committed his gospel to writing long before in a fragmentary form, leaving it to Mark to be filled out with reverential hand for the Church after his departure? It is well known that the gospel of Mark contains some incongruities of style. The last twelve verses have long been regarded as coming from a later hand than the original author. Yet they are quoted as genuine by so early a witness as Irenæus (A. D. 170), and as a condensed statement of facts they are very similar to the first thirteen verses of the gospel.

Let us turn to some other peculiarities. Passing by the first thirteen verses as only a compendium of facts, whoever may be the real author, and omitting the last twelve verses, we find that Mark is very much the shortest of the gospels. And this brevity is the more significant when we note how the narrative is expanded with details and impressions that are omitted by the other evangelists. It is a characteristic especially valuable in a witness of facts, and has often been remarked upon as a striking proof that the author of Mark's gospel must have been a companion of Jesus.

The style, too, reminds us at once of Peter recounting his Master's history to his own countrymen of Galilee. It agrees with all that we know of the man; abrupt, honest, impetuous. As we should expect from a fisherman, the principal facts and deepest impressions are given without much regard to order of time or logical completeness. This shows Peter as he was, a man of a strong mind and deep sensibilities, but not of education and literary training. Rather a man of action than of discourse, Peter speaks here as in his sermons recorded in the Acts and in his epistles, convincing more through sympathetic force than by a formal argument or rhetorical effort.

The language of this gospel, as distinguished from subject-matter or literary style, is a further support of Peter's authorship. It is generally said by the critics to be very bad Greek, such as would be used only among the more illiterate part of the people. Peter may have picked up some Greek while yet engaged in his calling at Capernaum, as Greeks were more or less numerous there. He would naturally become more conversant with that tongue in his subsequent experiences, though it goes without saying that he was never a Greek scholar. Mark is called by early writers Peter's interpreter. Some make the word to mean only a secretary. In any case it is not likely that a man employed in that capacity, who had been reared at Jerusalem and had traveled extensively in his youth among the centers of Greek culture and learning, would make such bad work of either translation or composition. Far more probable does it appear that Mark was too wise and reverent to change the writing of his spiritual father more than was strictly necessary to render it complete and intelligible to the Greek-speaking world. The Latinisms occurring in this gospel may have arisen from the commingling of Romans with the Galileans. The Aramaic expressions found here and there—"Talitha cumi" (v, 41), "Ephphatha" (vii, 34), "Abba" (xiv, 36)—show a Galilean atmosphere of thought.

The evidence to be gathered from the personal allusions in Mark's gospel are hardly conclusive; but it seems to us singular that the omission of Peter's name in some places, or of events in which he had a prominent part, should be taken by some for proof that he was not the author of the gospel. The same reasoning would establish beyond a doubt that John had nothing to do with writing the fourth gospel. The omissions referred to would not have been made if Mark had been the sole author of the gospel now bearing his name. We see an evidence of modesty in the story of Peter's confession (viii, 29), and in the answer to his question concerning the recompense of the apostles (x, 28), as compared with the corresponding passages in Matthew. The mention of Boanerges as a surname given by Christ to the sons of Zebedee, and the failure to record their mother's ambition for them, are strongly suggestive of Peter as a near and considerate friend. Peter was impulsive and ardent, but not selfish nor egotistic. In these respects he surpassed both John and Paul. Rather his reluctance to give offense was the occasion of complaisance sometimes amounting to weakness (Gal. ii, 11–14). Perhaps this same characteristic may also account for some peculiarities in the gospel given out under his authority. At any rate, the Galilean standpoint of Mark's gospel is seen in the following particulars :

1. It makes no mention whatever of Christ's birth in Bethlehem, nor of any circumstances elsewhere related in connection with that event.

2. Except in the opening verses prefixed by Mark it contains no citations of Old Testament prophecies that were fulfilled in the life of Jesus.

3. The history largely relates to Christ's ministry in Galilee until just before his crucifixion at Jerusalem. (This is followed by Matthew and Luke.)

4. It gives several Aramaic expressions used by the Saviour and not found elsewhere. "Talitha cumi" (v, 41), "Ephphatha" (vii, 34), "Abba" (xiv, 36).

5. The names of persons and places in Galilee are treated more as present and familiar than in the other synoptic gospels. There is no commenting or explanation about the facts in Galilee, though names and circumstances are given more fully than elsewhere. Here only do we find mention of the Lord's evangelistic tours in Decapolis and the nationality of the Syrophenician woman. Herod is always called by his popular title of "king," not "tetrarch." Peter's own humble calling and place of residence, with the names of his associates, are fully given.

6. There is no such familiarity with the Jewish country and people. We are told as information that "the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast" (ii, 18). The customs of the Pharisees as to washing of hands, of cups, and vessels are expressly described (vii, 3, 4). Mention is also made of the coming of the scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem (vii, 1). The writer of Mark omits the name of the woman who anointed the Saviour's feet at Bethlehem, as she was not personally known in Galilee.

7. A slight recognition of sectional animus is perceptible here and there. The Saviour's rebuke of the Pharisees for traditionalism and hypocrisy is related (vii, 6–13); also his stern prophecy of their ultimate ruin because of rejecting him as Messiah (xii, 9–12). Our Lord's pathetic lament over the city of Jerusalem is not recorded by Mark, though given by both Matthew and Luke. The author tells how Peter was identified as one of the followers of Jesus of Nazareth by his Galilean dialect (xiv, 66–70). He also gives a very particular account of Barabbas, of the shameful conduct of the chief priests and others at the crucifixion, of Simon the Cyrenian, of the Galilean women who were present, and of Joseph of Arimathea. Many of these details would hardly be so important at Rome as in Galilee. But Pilate was not leniently judged, and the whole barbarous cruelty of the soldiers is related without one word about Herod, the Galilean king.

8. On the other hand, the author of Mark relates the story of John the Baptist's martyrdom at length as a matter of Galilean history. He mentions the Saviour's tender compassion for the common people that thronged about him "because they were as sheep not having a shepherd," and because of their infirmities and privations and the sacrifices they made to hear the Gospel (i, 34–41; vi, 34–50; viii, 2, 3). The story of the tribute money taken from the fish's mouth is omitted, probably because it might have given unnecessary offense to the local authorities still living at Capernaum. A remarkably significant omission is that of the Saviour's anathemas against Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, as recorded by both Matthew (xi, 20–24) and Luke (x, 13–15).

9. This gospel, more than any other, makes prominent the humanity of Jesus Christ as he appeared to men around him

He was a carpenter, had relations and neighbors, felt as a man, was weary, grieved, compassionate, angry (iii, 5). This is a strong proof of early date and Peter's authorship. If we admit that the human element may coexist in any degree with the divine inspiration of the sacred Scriptures, then this explanation of its origin takes nothing from the inspired authority of the gospel according to Mark. If possible, it rather strengthens that authority. The name of the gospel is of secondary importance; yet as Mark outlived Peter and published this gospel at Rome, being the responsible editor, it is not hard to see how the present title may have arisen.* The sacred canon was not always the same in the earliest writers; but it is possible to understand how this gospel came to be placed after Matthew.†

When we recall the dim tradition of a "gospel by Peter," and another "of the Nazarenes," whose nature is not really known, and that Christ's followers were long called "Galileans," or "Nazarenes," we seem to recover lost history (Acts xxiv, 5). The derivation of Matthew's gospel from the original one of Peter, before it was republished by Mark, seems to present no great difficulties. There was a demand at Jerusalem for a written history of Christ similar to that possessed by the Galileans. The latter was confessedly not a complete work, and from the standpoint of a Hebrew consciousness a new gospel was necessary. In undertaking this task Matthew, perhaps assisted by James, would naturally make use of the former gospel, condensing some portions, introducing much new matter, and filling out the plan to something like logical completeness. The idea was still to present, not a chronicle, but a picture of Christ and his mission. Therefore the division of his ministry into Galilean and Judean sections was left as before; but the point of view was changed in accordance with the audience.

* The real occasion for republishing this fragmentary gospel at Rome was, no doubt, the realized importance of Peter's testimony as a personal witness of Jesus's ministry, sufferings, death, and resurrection; also as one who was especially honored by the Saviour on more than one occasion, and who was, besides, the natural leader of the twelve apostles.

† The position of the books in the canon is of little weight in deciding their sequence of origin. Early authorities give different orders of the gospels. Besides, Matthew was probably at one time the leading gospel among Jewish Christians; an earlier one, left in a fragmentary form by Peter and completed by Mark, may have been put in the second place by reason of its being less comprehensive.

The gospel according to Matthew is more elaborate and finished in every way than Mark. The style is better, the Greek is improved, and the logical arrangement is more apparent. It begins with the genealogy of Christ. Then come the history of his birth at Bethlehem and the various important episodes associated with that great event. The Sermon on the Mount, strangely omitted by Mark, is now reported in full, with some apparent references to the state of religion in Judea and Jerusalem (v, 20, 35; vii, 29). Many other sayings of Christ, with fresh incidents of his ministry and numerous parables before unmentioned, crowd the pages of Matthew's gospel, while few things given by Mark are here passed over altogether. But we see everywhere the indications of a new moral environment, of a Hebrew consciousness that is absent in Mark. The fulfillment of the prophecies in Christ is constantly noted. The new and more spiritual character of Christ's teaching is emphasized in contrast with the formality and coldness of Judaism; yet the author remarks Christ's recognition of the official dignity and authority of the scribes and Pharisees (xxiii, 2, 3). Again he dwells upon the mission of Christ to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (x, 5, 6; xv, 24), and he records the Master's indictment of the Jewish hierarchy and his lament over the city of Jerusalem with unequaled fullness and pathos. In this gospel are no explanations concerning Jewish customs and the like. Everything in Judea is familiar. But not so with reference to Galilee. No mention is made of Joseph and Mary's residence at Nazareth before their sojourn at Bethlehem. The author states in a distant way that, after returning from Egypt, Joseph "turned aside into the parts of Galilee: and he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth." The added prophecy seems almost an apology.

Again, he describes the beginning of the Saviour's ministry with a quotation from Isaiah, calling the north country "Galilee of the Gentiles" (iv, 15), and intimating that the people were in deep need of moral illumination. He also says of Jesus, "Leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast" (iv, 13). Again, he says, as of something far off, "Jesus, walking by the Sea of Galilee," but Mark puts it vividly, "Now as he walked by the Sea of Galilee." He calls Herod the "tetrarch;" and his own former place under the government of Galilee is perhaps the reason he so frequently recalls the Saviour's words concerning the class of "publicans." He omits the name of Jairus and of Decapolis, the blind man's cure at Bethsaida, the name of Bartimeus, and the story of the poor widow that put two mites into the treasury. All these doubtless impressed Matthew less than Peter. Yet Matthew was friendly to Peter, and could use his gospel in all good conscience as a source of information.

The gospel of Matthew must have been written early. The allusions to the calling of the Gentiles (viii, 11, 12; xx, 16; xxi, 43; xxii, 8–10; xxv, 32) imply a date not far from the time when Barnabas and Paul pleaded the cause of the Gentile converts before the council of the apostles (Acts xv). Such views could hardly have matured in their minds much before that time, and soon afterward the apostles were dispersed.

If our position in regard to the gospel of Mark and its relation to that of Matthew is fairly established, we can certainly feel greater confidence as to the relation of Luke. This is more like Matthew than like Mark, although it follows the general order of both in treating of the Saviour's ministry as Galilean and Judean, with special reference to incidents on the last journey up to Jerusalem. But here, for the first time, we come in contact with genuine Greek culture as revealed in correct grammar and a true literary style. Though there are traces of rabbinical learning, as well as of secular training (i, 5–80; ii, 1, 21–39; iii, 1, 2; ix, 53; xiii, 1–5; xxiii, 1–7, etc.), yet both the Galilean and Hebrew consciousness sink away out of sight in this gospel by Luke. The fulfillment of prophecy is noted only in a general way (xxiv, 25–27, 44–46). The Jews are condemned for blindness and hypocrisy, but the calling of the Gentiles is not emphasized. The author does not profess to have had personal acquaintance with Jesus, but he evidently made free use of the gospels already in existence, omitting, modifying, or adding from other sources of undoubted authority in consultation, as is supposed, with the apostle Paul. The whole fabric of the gospel is woven afresh, in accordance with a new and broader view of the Saviour's mission than was given before. In reporting the author makes more of the substance of Christ's teaching than of the literal precept, and he has an artistic sense of propriety and effect in composition. Among the new sayings, incidents, and parables here introduced we perceive an emotional element and an analysis of mental states not seen in any other gospel. We accept the usual view of the authorship, date, and purpose of this, the last of the synoptic books.

John's gospel, in relation to the others, is like the top of a tripod candlestick. The synoptic gospels represent the Galilean, Hebrew, and Græco-Roman standpoints of thought; but John, while recognizing the importance and correctness of their work, which he did not desire to change, had lived to outgrow his early and rudimentary views of Christ's mission in the world. He now desires, out of the fullness of a long, rare, and ripe experience, to complete the record and supply some elements heretofore omitted. Therefore he undertakes to fill some gaps left by the former gospels. He gives some important incidents of the Lord's early ministry that were previously known to but few. He describes the occasional visits of Jesus to Jerusalem, his discourses there in the temple, his relations to the family at Bethany, the raising of Lazarus, the circumstances of the last supper, and the remarkable words of our Lord upon that occasion, together with other details, which John alone, as a privileged person at the house of the high priest, and as the apostle most personally intimate with Jesus, would naturally be able to furnish. Over all, from the beginning of his gospel to its close, he throws the one quality that found such unusual development in his own mind as a Christian and theologian. It is simply that deep and clear apprehension of spiritual truth which the beloved apostle caught from his Master when all others were slow in its recognition. It needs no comment to show that the standpoint of this gospel is preeminently Christian, and that it was written for the "perfecting of the saints" in Christ.

This, in brief, is our view of the origin and sequence of the four gospels. It is not wholly new nor eminently critical; but it brings together a number of elements that have been floating disconnectedly and binds them into natural harmony.

Art. III.—"HAMLET," FROM THE STANDPOINT OF THEOLOGY.

To say, as most critics do, that the drama of "Hamlet" is the finished product of Shakespeare's pen is to assign it at once its place as the masterpiece of literature. For the incomparable genius whose works are the crowning glory of the English mind the diligent student comes to feel an admiration which rises almost to adulation, and which would be inexcusable were it not the case that those who are most capable of appreciating Shakespeare, because nearest him in gifts, are the ones who are most unreserved in their homage. Men like Milton and Dryden and Goethe and Carlyle look up to him as to some tallest peak of the Himalayas towering over the foothills that nestle at its base. As the fruit, therefore, of Shakespeare's ripened thought and observation, as a representation of human life into which he has poured his intensest powers, his "Hamlet" marks the highest point which the intellect of man, unaided by special inspiration, has reached.

But about this play hangs an obscurity strikingly in contrast with the naïve simplicity which elsewhere characterizes the poet's work. In its heart lies a secret which many have tried to fathom, but which yet defies discovery. The number of suggested explanations is the best evidence that none has commanded general assent; and, like a veiled Isis upon whose face none may look, the play of "Hamlet" still wears its mask of impenetrable mystery.

This very fact, however, leaves possible to us the supposition that such inscrutableness is a part of the poet's purpose. Perhaps he wished to portray a mystery; and his ability to place us, where he himself stood, confronted by an unsolved enigma, is the highest encomium upon his unrivaled art. May he not have meant to show us man himself rather than individual faculties—instead of striking single notes to sweep the gamut at a stroke? Have we not here a revelation of the poet's own struggles to find a unit of expression for that wayward and incomprehensible being we call man—a unit after which so many have striven, but ending at last, with Shakespeare as with others, in a confession of failure? Does the poet not here teach us that man, placed in the midst of nature, must, after threading all its avenues and searching everywhere in its heights and depths to find some help for living and dying, be compelled to acknowledge nature's insufficiency to give this help, and return baffled and hopeless from his quest; and, by the discovery that his wings are not broad enough to touch the outer walls of the holy of holies in which he dwells, be forced to the conclusion, as was Socrates, that only a direct revelation from God can remove doubt and give clear light upon the pathway of duty and safety?

If this explanation is at all plausible, or even in the line of truth, the value of the drama to the theologian is incalculable. If a teacher, unexcelled by any of his race in the combination of profundity, breadth, insight, and sympathy; capable of appreciating and expressing every mood of our common humanity; one in whom the spirit of great nature seems to have incarnated itself, using his faculties as its oracles; and who had, therefore, all competency for his task with the sole exception of that special touch of God's Spirit which we call inspiration, is weak in matters relating to moral conduct and happiness, where Moses and Isaiah and Paul and John are strong, is empty where they are rich, is dubious and hesitating where they walk erect in clear light, and is compelled to clothe his thoughts with mystery and own his inability to "dissolve doubts"—what ampler proof than this can be given of our need of a Bible, or where shall we find deeper cause for gratitude that "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost?" Whether this solution is tenable must be decided by examination of the history of the hero from whom the tragedy takes its name.

If heredity and environment are the controlling factors in human destiny and happiness, as many now say, it were hard to find one more favorably circumstanced than was Hamlet. Of princely birth and station, of "noble and most sovereign reason," of "unmatched form and feature," all natural gifts and graces uniting in him with the accomplishments of culture, the happiest auguries of the people combined with his own ideal dreams to predict a future as bright as purity, youth, and hope can create. Alas for us that such warm and fervid fancies, when they descend from their celestial birthplace into the cold atmosphere of earth, gender a mist that blinds, chills, and benumbs!

Out of the happy illusions in which the world lay bathed in a soft sunlight of peace the dreamer is awakened by a shock that rudely tests the foundation upon which hope and experience had been based. To such crises human life is exposed—an evidence of man's superiority to the mechanical apparatus of material existence. Such a crisis came to David Hume, to John Stuart Mill; such has come to many another soul; and its coming always makes an epoch. The form in which it came to Hamlet was this: His mother, the embodiment to him of all virtue and grace, had, within a brief period of his father's death and under circumstances which cruelly outraged his feelings of delicacy, married the brother of that father, now the sovereign of Denmark, but who was to Hamlet's own parent as a satyr to Hyperion. His happy isle lay devastated by a tornado, his bright dreams were eclipsed by the blackness of night, doubt and despair overwhelmed faith and hope, and life itself seemed insupportable.

In this state of skeptical uncertainty strange tidings were brought to him. The spirit of his father had left the invisible realm of death and had been seen by mortal eyes. At his demand it appeared to him, talked with him, disclosed the secrets of the past, gave him counsel as to duty in the future. On Hamlet the impression made was profound and lasting. At once the domain of the universe widened and knowledge was afforded of something beyond this world. The grave does not end all. The dead live. More than that, they possess memory, will, foresight, purpose. Human thought cannot be cramped within the limits of the seen and present. In fact, there came to him with intense power the conviction of the supernatural.

Thomas De Quincey, in one of the most eloquent paragraphs to be found in English literature, has said:

> What is life? Darkness and formless vacancy for a beginning, or something beyond all beginning; then next a dim lotus of human consciousness finding itself afloat upon the bosom of waters without a shore; then a few sunny smiles and many tears; a little love and infinite strife; whisperings from paradise and fierce mockeries from the anarchy of chaos; dust and ashes; and once more darkness circling round as if from the beginning, and in this way rounding or making an island of our fantastic existence—that is human life.

But if such had been Hamlet's conception the appearance of the ghost had shattered it forever. Human life an island? Nay, not so; a peninsula rather, a promontory jutting out into the boundless sea of being, but connected by a narrow isthmus swept by storms with some vast undiscovered continent over which vapors hang and on whose shore billows break, yet whose bourn lay open to his view.

There came to Hamlet, we have said, the conviction of the supernatural. We must define what we mean when we use this word. What is the supernatural? It is quite wide of the mark and astray from the path to divide the universe into two realms and call one nature and the other the supernatural. We shall simply waste our strength in the endeavor to discover the boundary line that separates them. The temptation will be irresistible, either with Drummond and his school to compress the supernatural within its narrowest possible limits short of extinction, or else with the faith-curists and others similarly deluded to enlarge its area until it almost obliterates nature. The distinction between them is not territorial. By the supernatural is meant not facts, but a power. The word in strictness of speech is not correctly applicable to things, events, processes, but to the force which controls and manifests itself through these. What is cognizable by the senses or comes under the domain of law is nature; and nothing appears in the supernatural which is not in nature save the supernatural itself. For this reason the proof of the supernatural is always difficult in this world of nature, since it is so easy for the positivist, who accepts only facts, to deny the force behind them. We are given means of judging as to this, since the poet in the play tells us that others besides Hamlet had seen the ghost. It had appeared to Bernardo, plain, blunt soldier of the matter-of-fact kind:

> A primrose by a river's brim
> A yellow primrose was to him,
> And it was nothing more.

He could tell how the ghost looked, how long it stayed, but the appearance of the specter aroused no deeper curiosity, and excited no further inquiry. It had appeared to Horatio, man of books, learned scholar, diligent student. In his mind it took its place with similar omens, wonders, prodigies—strange, perhaps unaccountable things, but all within the realm of nature. To Polonius, worldly wise and practical politician, warped by the duplicities and hollowness of an artificial and conventional life; to Laertes, steeped in the lusts and low ambitions of sensual enjoyment, it did not condescend to reveal itself at all—that were casting pearls before swine. But to Hamlet the vision brought indubitable proof of the existence of the supernatural, not subjective certainty only, but objective as well; it existed, not in his fancy merely, but had a ground of being in the consciousness of others. More than this, the channels of communication between it and us are open. Did this assurance of the supernatural suffice for him? and could he rest with this? The sequel must answer.

This visitant from another sphere had not appeared simply to the eye. He had brought revelations to the mind, had told a harrowing tale of his iniquitous murder—tidings that could not elsewhere have been gathered. These must be tested. For into Hamlet's ear only had they been told; they came to him individually as a private revelation. What guarantee of their truth was there? Upon what grounds of reliability could the statements demand credence? There can never be for any human being an obligation to believe a lie; what is false cannot be made binding by any authority. Hamlet, therefore, devised the scheme of a pantomime, in which the details of the crime should be rehearsed in the sight of the guilty parties thereto, and by its observed effects on them was the revelation to be tested. The experiment was successful. As the terrible sin was unearthed before the eyes of the royal criminals there was needed only to see the convulsive tremors, the blanching lips, the self-convicting flight, to be assured that the ghost had spoken truly and to have unquestionable proof of the correctness of his revelations.

It is not, however, in the realm of intellect that the revelation of the supernatural finds its chief value. If "three fourths of human life is conduct," as Matthew Arnold says, then it must be to guide the moral act rather than to satisfy the inquisitive mind that its supervention is needed. Ethics is higher than dogma, as the end is higher than the means. Knowledge is not of itself and necessarily power. Portia said truly, "If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches, and poor men's cottages princes' palaces." The primary motive for the appearance of the ghost was not to unlock the secrets of the grave, but to lay upon Hamlet a stern duty. He was commanded to avenge his father's death. But in the command itself lay this element of weakness, that no moral law can be authoritative which bases public and common duties on grounds that are individual solely. If Kant's doctrine be true that the first dictum of moral philosophy is, "So act as if thy maxim were a universal law," then the grounds upon which we act must be such as to justify themselves not to the personal part of our conscience only, but to the social as well. It was not possible for Hamlet, as has been said, nor is it for us, to subpœna a ghost at will. And in this lies the ineradicable fallacy which, despite Martineau's eloquent exposition, must vitiate the teaching, "Every man his own Bible." The "seat of authority in religion" cannot be the individual himself. Revelation must be more than instruction or inspiration to the private conscience.

The command, moreover, offended Hamlet's sense of justice. It enjoined the punishment of the guilty king, while it spared the perhaps no less guilty queen. Are, then, the beings above like frail men with human passions, partialities, prejudices? Hamlet felt sure that no command can be obligatory which enjoins unrighteousness. Omnipotence itself cannot make wrong right. Man is so really the image of his Creator that what is absolutely contradictory to the moral sense of one must be so to the other. No augury or miracle could ever compel a pagan to reverence Jove or Hermes, whose notions of social or sexual morality fell below his own. He might deprecate their wrath or propitiate their favor, but love and esteem them he could not. The Judge of all the earth must do right, and that cannot be his will which is not consonant with his character.

Hence, therefore, the assurance of the supernatural did not bring to Hamlet any quieting of doubts, or calm of spirit, or cessation of strife within, or indication of duty, or that coordination of conduct with conscience in which alone lies peace. What could do this? Nothing less than an open, written, public revelation from God—an inspired Bible. And for lack of this he faltered, wavered, doubted, failed, and fell. In this direction lies the lesson of the great drama. It is a commentary.

whether intended or not, unrivaled in its depth and power, upon the words of one infinitely greater than Shakespeare, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead."

We may now compare with the above the interpretations put by others upon the drama. Goethe, the man who since Shakespeare's death has come nearest to him in gifts, saw in it the purpose to depict a great task laid upon a soul able to comprehend it, but unequal to its performance. This is all true, only that Goethe stops short of telling us, as he was fully competent to do, wherein Hamlet's incapacity lay. He leads us to the threshold of the mystery, but refuses to guide us to the shrine. That would have involved self-condemnation.

The trend of modern interpretation is toward that rendering which sees in Hamlet's vacillation an irreconcilable conflict between thought and action, and this is Coleridge's somewhat self-justifying theory. Thought, it is said, widens but weakens; action energizes and narrows. But thought and action are not necessarily exclusive of each other, even when both are exhibited in their highest forms. There have been men in whom were combined peerless power and range of thought with intensest energy and celerity of action. Moses, Paul, Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon were of this stamp, and such men spring to the front as the sovereigns of their race. Thought always precedes effective action and is its most fertile and prolific source. The war songs of Tyrtæus were worth more to the Spartans for inspiration than all the genius for action of their most consummate military leaders. There is the profoundest wisdom in Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra:"

> Not on the vulgar mass
> Called "work," must sentence pass,
> Things done, that took the eye and had the price;
> O'er which, from level stand,
> The low world laid its hand,
> Found straightway to its mind, could value in a trice:
>
> But all, the world's coarse thumb
> And finger failed to plumb,
> So passed in making up the main account:
> All instincts immature,
> All purposes unsure,
> That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's amount.

Decision and energy are high, but not the only, virtues; irresolution is not always vice. If so Hamlet would fall below Macbeth, or the jealous fool Othello, or Shylock, or that devil Iago, or even mad Lear, and Caliban would be rated higher than Ferdinand or Prospero himself. There is plenty of motion which is only circular, much exercise which adds nothing to real progress.

Hamlet himself was not lacking in capacity of action. Where duty was plain, where routine had marked out a path, as in the voyage to England and the encounter with the pirates, he was prompt, alert, decided, successful. It was in the high moral realm alone, in questions of large moment vitally affecting conduct and happiness, that he paused. On the low field he easily assumed the precedence which his abilities commanded; in the highest he halted. No lamp of God threw its light about his path, and he questioned, hesitated, failed. But "wisdom is justified of all her children." Better that the imperial eagle should pause on motionless wing in the free mid-heaven, if his keen eye sees no quarry worthy his prowess, than waste his energies in futile swoop. When the light which streams on the shaded avenues of life is entangled in the intercepting foliage, through which it falls only in mottled patches that hide the pitfalls, it is surely wiser to stand irresolute and ask if elsewhere there be no safer road.

But every man must have some philosophy of life, some code by which to measure the discharge of duty. If he does not have or will not take the Bible he must needs try that which seems to him the best. Hamlet's code—perhaps it was Shakespeare's own—was that which he commends in the matchless counsel to the players, an epitome which every public speaker should carefully study, namely, to seek the middle path, avoiding all extremes. It is not the best guide, but it is a good one. On this theory, if one is to shun the excess of the vile and base he must forego the other extreme of the high and noble. He may thereby miss paradise, but at least he escapes purgatory. He fails to hear the softest and sweetest harmonies of the soul, but its harshest discords do not jar upon his ears; and if he loses life's richest prizes, at least he is not cheated by its pinchbeck. This has certainly been the code of some of the world's greatest thinkers. It was that of the author of Ececclesiastes, with his "be not over much righteous" nor "wicked;" of Confucius, with his doctrine of "the mean;" of Aristotle, with his "nothing to excess;" of Bacon, who says that, "though a man side himself in the rising, it is good to balance himself when placed;" of Talleyrand, with his "above all, no enthusiasm;" of Lessing, who advises artists to "take passion or action not at its acme, either lowest or highest, but in the mean."

The inherent weakness of this code is that it cannot be continuously maintained. It can be available only in the quiet hours of life. And as pauses are few and passions strong, as crises come unexpectedly, and sorrows not as "single spies but in battalions," this philosophy fails in the momentous epochs. Nature always demands and exacts her rights. Passions may be smothered, but they smolder. Suppression here means volcano yonder. The ascetic who eliminates from his nature all pleasure of physical enjoyment simply makes room for intenser pride, fanaticism, and bitterness. Hamlet's code could not endure the strain of actual life. His gushing friendship for Horatio, his ardent love for Ophelia, passing that of "forty thousand brothers," his overwhelming emotions at the revelations of the ghost—these and a hundred other things swept him from his moorings into a seething sea without chart, pilot, or destination.

No code of morals can be complete or final which does not enjoin full and harmonious expansion of all the composite nature of man. Development, not dwarfing, is the law of well-being. It is not by reducing life to its lowest levels, but by directing it to the summits, that perfection comes. We may mourn that Rome did not heed the prudent counsels of Cicero, yet after all the world is richer for Cæsar and Antony; and though the moderation of Erasmus might have saved us some of the evils of four centuries of division, to the mass of mankind either Luther or Leo X will be the idol and hero. We hardly appreciate the service which the Bible has rendered to progress by evolving the strength of human character. The peace, assurance, and light upon duty that come from firm persuasion of its truth leave man's unreserved energies free for work. We know that the anchorage will hold, and are undisturbed whether the winds sweep inshore or seaward. If the soldier is sure that his goods and loved ones are safe within the stronghold he can march without misgiving to the campaign, and on the day of battle deliver the full weight of his blow.

But Hamlet's code gave him no answer to doubts or guide to duty. He could neither decide what he ought to do nor be satisfied with his indecision. And so the inexorable laws of destiny drove him, equally with his less regal associates and with all his royal powers, over rapids to the awful plunge. The king had taken ambition for his law, and it had failed to quiet his remorse; Polonius had provided against all emergencies by diplomacy only to perish through a blunder; Laertes made honor his ideal, and dishonorably poisoned his rapier; Ophelia sought her ideal in love, and her shattered reason was jangled out of tune by disappointment; Horatio sought his in scholarship, and it could not cure him of his corroding and dissatisfying skepticism. And circumstances over which Hamlet had renounced or lost control carried him whither he would not, and with a cry of despair upon his lips the noble heart cracked and the sweet prince bade good-night to the world.

It has been said that Shakespeare never moralizes. This is not true. Who has ever spoken more impressively of the sanctities of life—of friendship, temperance, love, courage, justice, charity? His delineations of women are the most exquisite ever penned. Murillo's "Immaculate Conception," the most beautiful picture of joyous purity and innocent trust on which the eye can rest in the world of art, is not so entrancing as the portraitures of Miranda and Perdita, of Juliet and Imogen and Cordelia. Who has ever spoken more reverently and tenderly of death? Even Falstaff, glutton, libertine, coward, ribald, knave, does not set behind the clouds without some of the grandeur with which the king of terrors invests all who touch his staff. Says Dame Quickly:

> After I saw him fumble with the sheets, and play with flowers, and smile upon his finger ends, I knew there was but one way. . . . So 'a cried out "God, God, God!" three or four times: now I, to comfort him, bid him, 'a should not think of God; I hoped there was no need to trouble himself with any such thoughts yet. So 'a bade me lay more clothes on his feet: I put my hand into the bed, and felt them, and they were as cold as any stone.

But it is true that he never preaches. We wish he had done so. To mark out with buoys the channels of life is by no means so noble a task as to pilot frail craft safely past the perilous places. The moralities of the here and now do not satisfy human needs. Man is a being of "large discourse, looking before and after;" and on the most momentous questions neither nature nor its great interpreter give guiding light. It is not simply mundane ethics we require, but cosmic and eternal as well.

But the poet has revealed to us his own conception of his task and its scope. It was "to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure" —a high ideal, truly; but it is distinctly and confessedly on a plane vastly lower than that of the sacred Scriptures, whose declared purpose is to hold the mirror that "we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord," may be "changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." The Bible is not merely a storehouse of information; it is a power for transformation.

If any man wishes proof that our race needs a written revelation, an inspired Bible, he may find convincing evidence in the study of Hamlet. No pen, save one to which God has himself communicated the fire of life, has delineated a loftier character. In Hamlet was found every essential to success except the possession of such a revelation, and the lack of this led to failure. How different might have been his fate had he been able to say with Paracelsus:

> If I stoop into a tremendous sea of cloud
> It is but for a time: I press God's lamp
> Close to my breast; its splendor soon or late
> Will pierce the gloom: I shall emerge some day!

Art. IV.—THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE PASSIONS.

Grace is equal to its every task. It is as infinite in capability and adaptability as God, from whom its energies proceed; yet how imperfect its effects all know who have profoundly studied Christian character. The reason is plain. Never until there is given him an instrument equal to his genius can the musician exhibit his full power. The problem of sanctification is the problem of taking that ruined instrument, the human soul, of putting it into the best possible repair, and of rendering it capable of its highest effects. It is the instrument we are to study, not the skill of the workman who constructs it, nor of the artist who employs it for the expression of his thought.

One of the principal sources of disharmony in human nature is the passions. The vast majority of Christians experience their chief difficulty in the control of the feelings. However we may conceive the relation of intelligence and sensibility, we must admit that only when thought is tinged with emotion are we conscious of approbation or of guilt. Pure intellectuality is morally colorless. But the thought cast up from the heaving ocean of feeling brings with it the odor of the emotion which tossed it upon the shore of consciousness. Passion is character. Or, more properly, the passions, in their interpenetrations and mutual balancings, distinguish the character of the individual. This gives the passions a place among the deepest elements of our being. They are to character what the mountain ranges are to a continent. They determine its fertility, its wealth, the direction and volume of its rivers, and give form to the surface of the land.

Popularly considered, the passions are the more sudden and violent ebullitions of feeling. He is passionate whose temperament leads him to sudden outbursts of anger or other emotions. To the passionate man, therefore, we ordinarily attribute but little of constancy and but a shallow depth of feeling. But it is doubtful whether these phenomena of the emotional nature, however striking, are worthy the name of passion. Kant, following Wolff, denominated every such exhibition of emotion an affection (affekt), and distinguished sharply between these and the passions which lie deeper and have more of intelligence in them.* According to this distinction anger is an affection, but hate is a passion. It is perfectly evident that anger is thoughtless, while hate may be under the dominion of the intelligence. Anger evinces, at least in some measure, a lack of self-control. Hate is deliberate. It may be restrained or it may be gratified, as best suited to its purposes. Anger may be called a weakness. Hate is an evidence of sustained power. Anger may indicate no essential malevolence of disposition; it must be excited by external conditions. Hate is inherent in the soul, and will influence the soul even when there is no outward occasion for it. Anger proves the mobility of the feelings, and is often mere excitement accompanied by a minimum of resentment. Hate may maintain an outward and inward calm, and show itself only when it has had time to study how to strike the most fatal blow. A similar contrast might be drawn between many other emotions, although there are passions without any corresponding affections, and affections without any corresponding passions. It is of the nature of passion, however, that it may manifest itself when conditions are favorable in the most violent emotions. There is no anger so dreadful as that which derives its energy from some deep passion. He who hates his enemy may also be provoked to anger by him. Under such circumstances the ebullition of feeling is strengthened by the fundamental disposition of hate. A like terror of anger, however, may be supported by a benevolent as well as a malevolent emotion. The patriot may become furiously angry upon hearing of some unexpected act of treachery, being moved thereto solely by his love of country, and without any of the passion of hate. The affection robs of strength, the passion impels and incites to action. The former is never a motive, the latter always.

We may add that in essence what we here call passion includes also appetites and propensities. Hence the passions are both physical (appetites) and spiritual (propensities). Where the appetites and propensities combine, there passion is strongest. The natural and innocent desire for food in combination with the propensity to self-indulgence causes gluttony. An affection may develop a passion if often indulged. The first effect of wine may be a pleasing sensation of taste, resulting in a mere affection. The desire for a repetition of this sensation may lead to frequent indulgence, whereby an artificial appetite or craving for wine is produced. So one who has never known hate may by frequent indulgence in anger develop the passion of hate. But this very fact proves that the passions and affections contain elements in common. Therefore, and also for the sake of comprehensiveness, we shall include under passion every form of emotion of which a description has now been given.

* Anthropologie, Edition Kirchmann, p. 164. The difference between an "affection" in this sense of the word and an affection considered as a feeling of attachment, or a kindly emotion, must be carefully noted. See also Wundt, Physiologische Psychologie, vol. ii, p. 410.

Strictly speaking, we should be obliged to use the term sanctification only in connection with those passions which God can approve; for sanctification looks toward employment, and the evil passions cannot be employed in God's service. But, yielding to the popular use, we shall employ the word here in its accustomed ambiguous sense, trusting to the caveat we have now entered to prevent misunderstanding. But are there any evil passions? Bishop Foster replies as follows:

> It is not the office of grace to eradicate human passions. There is nothing in them, when existing in a normal state, of the nature of sin. They were at first planted in the holy pair. They will remain in humanity while the earthly life remains. Holiness requires their proper subjugation and use. They are in their nature physical, and wholly void of moral character except as they become instruments of righteousness or unrighteousness.

Again the Bishop says:

> Evil dispositions and propensities are but perverted forms of good ones; and hence holiness or sanctification consists not in the eradication of them, but in the restoration of them to their legitimate character and use.*

The former quotation seems to have exclusive reference to what we have here called appetites. And so far what he says is probably wholly true. There certainly can be no harm in indulging the appetite for food merely because indulgence is strongly agreeable. It is not necessary to make our food and drink as unpalatable as possible, lest a sensuous enjoyment should be experienced. Were this avoidance of sensuous enjoyment carried into the domain of all the senses it would lead us beyond the most extreme position which asceticism ever held concerning the permissibility of pleasure. The eye enjoys light and color and the ear musical sound, and the enjoyment is alike sensuous in each case. It cannot be sin to get satisfaction from our bodily appetites, since God has made them capable of enjoyment, has provided the means for their gratification, and has even made our very welfare and mental and moral development dependent, at least in some measure, upon their exercise.* Even that view which limits the innocence of indulgence to the end for which God appointed them is to be considered as extreme. It may be innocent to gratify the palate at other times than when taking food for nourishment. But if the pleasures of the palate lead us to overload our system, or to deplete our purses unduly, or to neglect the comfort of our dependents, indulgence would at once become wrong. Of some of the bodily appetites it must even be said that they seem to have no object but the gratification of their possessors. This is true of the craving for harmony and melody, for variety in color and form. With many these are as truly a passion as the appetite for food. It may be said that these minister to the cultivation of the æsthetic nature, while the so-called baser appetites only degrade. But the indulgence of the baser appetites does not degrade, but rather ennobles, if enjoyed in proper degree and with suitable restrictions. The æsthetic cravings, on the other hand, may and often do lead to effeminacy and voluptuousness. Music, painting, and sculpture may minister to the soul, or they may be mere instruments of sensuous pleasure. The physical passions are only sinful when they are overindulged or so indulged as to militate against the soul, which, it must be sadly confessed, is very frequently done.

With regard to the passions of the soul the case is different. All of the bodily passions minister to both soul and body if properly indulged. But of some at least of the spiritual passions must it be said that they have no function in the preservation or improvement of self, or in benefit to others, but work only injury wherever and in whatever degree they are manifest. What good did hate ever do? In the proper sense of the word it is not a divine passion; for, although God hates sin, there is no malevolence in his hatred, but at most aversion. Yet malice is one of the chief ingredients in the human passion of hate. Indignation, a stern sense of justice, and similar emotions, all of which commend themselves in the exhibition, are wholly distinct and separate from the passion of hate, and indeed could scarcely exist where it exists. Anger may or may not coexist with it; but the proper exercise of the nobler passions is wholly out of the question in connection with an emotion so malevolent. Did any good ever come out of envy, or jealousy, or covetousness? They are not perversions of good passions. However it may be with others, these do not appear first in the form of virtues, which by some weakness or accident may be carried far enough to become vices. They are spiritual diseases, deformities of the soul. They are not to be transformed but supplanted. Neither they, their progenitors, nor their progeny have any place in the holy soul.

From the position now attained we may be able to discover the relation of the passions to the self. Does the "ego" include everything belonging to our inner conduct? Are the appetites, propensities, passions, and affections all constituent elements of ourselves? With regard to the first three we may answer unqualifiedly in the affirmative. They are in no sense external to us, but inherent in us. Without them our characters would not be what they are. Although up to a certain point in the knowledge of self their existence is often entirely unobserved and even unsuspected, yet they have determined our acts and, in part, at least, our thoughts. Whether good or bad they lie below the surface of consciousness, not, indeed, idle and inoperative, but all the more effective because they are not known to their possessor, and hence not guarded against. If the time arrives in the spiritual education of the individual when he discovers himself controlled by evil passions he must correct his own nature if he can. Then arises a conflict between the "ego" of choice and the "ego" of nature (heredity and education). Under such circumstances we discover within us two selves. But the will refuses to abdicate though every province in its rightful realm be in rebellion. The ruler insists that he is not responsible for the conduct of his perverse subjects. If one has risen to the Christian standpoint he cries out, "It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." But the natural unit disputes the claim of the volitional unit to supremacy, and the latter is never content until the two units coincide. But this can never guiltlessly take place until the former is brought into perfect harmony with the latter, for the latter dare not give way. The relation of the affections to the "ego" is different from that of the passions, in so far as the former are not the mere expression of the latter. They are transient rather than constant, and are awakened by external conditions. Were it not that the historical associations of these terms might mislead we should designate the passions as substance and the affections as accident. The former are inherent in character, the latter lie in the realm of conduct. It is true that the affections are expressions of character elements; but these elements are often negative rather than positive, defects rather than vices; and in any case it is the sources from which they spring, and not the affections themselves, which belong to the "ego." They show weakness in the character, and hence the need of correction, but in a manner wholly different from the passions.

The necessity of the sanctification of the passions follows from their nature and from their relation to the self; but it is also indicated by two special facts. The first is that they often lead us into fatal self-deception. To the general recognition of this fact witness is borne by the proverbs, "The wish is father to the thought;" "There are none so blind as those who will not see;" and, "Convince a man against his will, and he is of the same opinion still." An illustration is found in Esau, whose appetite was so roused that he sought for reasons to justify him in selling his birthright. Because of our passions we play the sophist with ourselves, and extenuate deeds we should otherwise condemn. The judgment acts in the interest of the passions. This frame of mind when habitual unfits us for all judicial, dispassionate consideration of the practical concerns of life. When viewed apart from ethics we call it prejudice. Where morals are concerned we term it perversion. Under such circumstances is it that men learn to destroy the vital general distinctions of right and wrong, and in specific instances to call evil good. It is a peculiarly subtle and dangerous, because a semiunconscious, form of hypocrisy. This is sufficiently subversive of good morals; but far less so than the second fact, namely, the power of the passions to bewilder and silence the conscience and understanding. In such cases reflection upon the moral quality of the act is suspended. The mind is wholly taken up with the impulse toward performance. So far as the intellect is at all engaged its function is merely to plan for execution. If at such times we can be hindered from acting long enough to come to ourselves we may be saved much sorrow. It is probable that, in the betrayal of our Lord, Judas Iscariot was thus controlled by passion; for when he reflected he would neither justify his act nor retain the price of blood. In most instances, as with Judas, reflection first begins after the passion has found gratification. In this respect the passions and affections are alike. For the time emotion almost wholly displaces thought, and we are in a transport of feeling.

We pursue now more closely the psychological processes of sanctification. And one of the most important facts to be noted here is the necessity of entire consecration, especially of its positive side of concentration. The will is so constituted that it can never act with energy and effect along more than one line at a time. "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea." In order to concentration there must be a powerful attraction —something which will fix and hold the attention. On the psychological side the whole problem of the sanctification of the passions and affections is how to get the attention drawn away from them to Jesus Christ the Saviour. In order to this the Holy Spirit is necessary and sufficient. "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." By a supernatural operation the soul is so affected that the passions no longer assert themselves. Such as are in themselves innocent, but needing restriction, however imperious they may formerly have been in their demands, are brought into easy subjection. Those which are evil, and over which we have long mourned, no more make themselves felt; and the uncontrollable, sinful emotions which we here call affections are no longer experienced. But the psychological explanation of it all is that we cease to look at self and look unto Jesus. And it is most necessary to insist upon this. As compared with that condition in which our evil passions are unrecognized by us because no conflict between them and conscience has ever arisen, a marked advance in the right direction is that state of the mind in which the attention is strongly concentrated upon their sinfulness and the whole energy of the soul is directed toward their suppression. Every such awakening is the prophecy of a possible advance in holiness. But the experience of vain endeavor to suppress or displace these unholy emotions by our own effort is perfectly explicable. The very attention we bestow upon them contributes to their nourishment. The "law" which betrays our wickedness to us becomes thereby the minister of death. We find the power of evil greater after it appears as evil than before. Beyond a certain point, therefore, what is needed is not a larger development of the self-consciousness of evil within, but a complete withdrawal of the attention from it. But such a withdrawal of attention is not enough. This might be effected in such a way as to leave the passions essentially as they were before the awakening. Fear of the power of inward sin must give place to confidence in the greater power of God. For the rest, it is a divine work, wrought we know not how. Here human effort and divine energy coalesce in a union whose elements are no longer distinguishable. But the result is that the soul, which has been led by grace to this point, finds the conscious evil passions gone and the divine Spirit within. It may be said to be an instantaneous work. It certainly is a complete work so far as it goes. We are, in a sense, as though these passions had never existed within us. Nor are we of those who believe that they are still present but only dormant. A passion is an energy of our being directed toward a certain object by the forces which control us. When the controlling forces change the passions must change. In whatever portion of the soul God is the controlling force, there sin must give way to holiness.

If it be objected that this cannot be, since whenever one backslides after reclamation from any appetite or passion he falls back again at once into his old fault, we reply that this is to be otherwise accounted for. Peter, the profane and impulsive fisherman, when he fell from grace after conversion, showed that the old habits still possessed him. The reformed and converted, and even wholly sanctified, victim of drink will go back to his cups if he fall from grace; and the former debauchee will return to his licentiousness. The spiritual propensities also show the same tendency to recurrence in those who have fallen from grace. But we have here merely the question of the explanation of the phenomena. This cannot be better made than on the supposition that the passions are only suppressed, not really displaced. Let us remember that a passion is an energy of the soul projected in a given direction by the controlling force within us. Let us suppose now that, instead of self or Satan, God becomes our controlling force. The passion disappears. We fall from grace and it reappears. By the very terms of the supposition the new, divine controlling force is gone. What more natural than that the old one should immediately reassert its supremacy? In this event the old passion would be almost certain to reappear; for grace does not change the potentialities of the soul; nor does it reconstruct, except by slow processes, its constitution. This remains the same, modifying the operations of grace and explaining why it is that not all Christians are exactly alike, but varied in their manifestations of divine principle within. A constitutional passion is not a passion which forms part of the constitution of the individual; for the constitution is the sum total of the capabilities, and these lie deeper than the passions which the capabilities produce under given conditions. Nevertheless, there is a relation between the constitution and the passions, some constitutions being more perfectly adapted to some passions than others. Hence, a constitutional passion is the one which is most easily and naturally produced by the capabilities of the soul. But a capability is only a capability, not an actuality. And if influences of different character operate in succession upon the soul the same aggregate of capabilities we will have a succession of results correspondent thereto. Hence it is that people are so often a surprise to themselves and to their most intimate friends. The untried soul can never predict what it will do under given conditions.

Does this seem to make the soul the prey of every external influence? Let it be replied that such would be the case were there not other laws operating to prevent this in some measure. The soul has the power of self-direction, at least within certain limits. But especially must we remember that impalpable but powerful influences acting upon us give us a certain direction often very decidedly emphasized long before we have reached the period when we are intellectually capable of discovering, accepting, or rejecting them. These are partly hereditary and prenatal, and partly such as are exercised upon us in our earliest years. As soon as we begin to be, action and reaction between the innate forces and possibilities of the soul and our environment begin. Arrived at the age when we become conscious personalities, we are still too young to do aught but enter upon the employment of our inheritance. It is only in later years that we begin in good earnest to adopt an ideal of life and compare ourselves therewith. By this time the tendencies of the soul are well established. When we open the soul, then, to new influences they have at first little power. This, together with the fact that we have a certain power of choice as to what new influences shall be allowed access to us, prevents the total annihilation of our identity. It is the perfection of this power of choice which constitutes the perfect freedom of the soul. He is not free who is involuntarily governed by what he inherited from the past; nor is he free who is so governed by the chance external influence of the hour. He is free who, with educated conscience and clarified reason, bows with the full conscious consent of his soul to the authority of God.

This seems to make man subject in order to be free, and to unsettle the firmest inward supports of conduct. It must be said in reply to this that if all men were absolutely free from every allegiance the result would be anarchy. Allegiance to Satan would result in bondage to passion again. Subjection to the world would produce a similar result. God only can rule a kingdom of freemen. Under God's government alone is the paradox of freedom in subjection abolished. As to the other difficulty, it is a question, after all, as to what is highest in character. It is a dream of the evolutionists that a time will come when every man's "spontaneous activities" shall be "congruous with the conditions imposed by the social environment formed by other such beings."

Conformably with the laws of evolution in general, and conformably with the laws of organization in particular, there has been and is in progress an adaptation of humanity to the social state, changing it in the direction of such an ideal congruity. . . .

The ultimate man is one in whom this process has gone so far as to produce a correspondence between all the promptings of his nature and all the requirements of his life as carried on in society. . . . In the conduct of the ideal man among ideal men that self-regulation which has for its motive to avoid giving pain practically disappears. No one having feelings which prompt acts that disagreeably affect others, there can exist no code of restraints referring to this division of conduct.*

Exactly such a state as this, so far as results are concerned, but with added accompaniments of blessedness, is the heaven of the Christian system. In heaven we can conceive of no clashing of interests, but only of perfect harmony. But if we correctly understand Mr. Spencer the methods by which this state is to be brought about are very different, in his conception, from those proposed by Christianity. We do not here refer to the forces employed, for it is evident that in this respect evolution and grace are radically different. But Mr. Spencer seems to refer the whole conduct of the ideal man to the promptings of his nature. The processes of evolution will have brought about in the ultimate man "a correspondence between all the promptings of his nature and all the requirements of his life as carried on in society." In that state no one will have "feelings which can prompt acts that disagreeably affect others," and hence "that self-regulation which has for its motive to avoid giving pain practically disappears." Such language undoubtedly indicates a condition in which the "spontaneous activities" of men will be right. They will do right because their feelings are right. In such persons there are no evil passions, and the good ones will have control of the life. "Self-regulation" will not be a necessity. Conduct will be unerringly right because the moving forces are unerringly right. This system appears at first sight as the most perfect conceivable. But look at it. It makes man a moral automaton. The clock provided with a compensation balance keeps perfect time because it is provided with perfect machinery. Neither Spencer's ideal man nor the clock needs any conscious self-regulation; both are perfectly adjusted to their conditions, and hence both will act with perfect precision. For the clock this may suffice, but for man it is not enough. Reason and will must always have their place in Christian conduct. Reason, passion, and volition must all be in harmony with each other and with God. And this is the state in which all will find themselves who enter heaven. It is not sufficient that reason know the right and the will enforce it. Better this than bad conduct. But a life conformed by volition to the demands of reason has in it a rigidity which is extremely displeasing as compared with the spontaneity of correct instincts. Such a life is full of conventionalities. It lacks grace and beauty, and there can be no wonder that so many men of faultless lives are therefore so unattractive. The perfect Christian ideal is that in which the individual has attained substantially the same emotional character with God; in which his judgments coincide with those of God; and in which his will is not swallowed up, but has become identical with his will—God's volitions man's volitions; not perforce, but by choice, emotion and reason completely concurring. This preserves to man his distinct identity, leaves him in the full responsible possession of the powers which conform him to the divine image, makes him morally like God by his own choice, and removes him from the category of the automata. Great as their influence is, therefore, we cannot believe that the passions sanctified would make the perfect man; for man is larger than his entire emotional nature.

Yet it must be confessed that were the evil passions displaced and the good ones devoted to their divinely appointed purposes, man would be incalculably holier than he now is. That this end may be attained we must despise no means within our reach. If the best time to begin a child's education is two hundred years before he is born, how much more true is it of the sanctification of the passions. God has so ordained that the strongest passions are those which are inborn. So far as they are bad they are most difficult of repression and displacement. So far as they are good they are most reliable and constant. Next to these, in respect to constancy and strength, are those which have been inwrought by early and long-continued education. Subsequent to the prenatal period, the best time for the sanctification of the passions is in infancy. Even the gracious virtues are not to be depended upon like those which are natural. The strongest characters are those whose passions, being inborn, have been developed by training and ennobled by grace. But for the adult whose natural inheritance and education have placed him within the power of evil dispositions grace is yet sufficient. The holy emotions implanted by the divine Spirit may be as yet rather affections than passions, but by long-continued submission to the influences of heaven they will become thoroughly intrenched in the soul. What is needed meanwhile is that God should continue more inviting to the soul than all attractions beside. There is no propensity too powerful for grace to correct. Except for the limitations of our finite nature there is no conceivable perfection to which, by grace, the most depraved may not in time arise. But for such results it is needful that, like the chosen three on the mount of transfiguration, our eyes should henceforth see Jesus only. Here faith and consecration become coincident conceptions; and it is under such conditions that Jesus is made unto us "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption."

Art. V.—WHEELS, WORK, AND WAGES.

The nineteenth century is on wheels and traveling with a speed never known before in history. It is literally and metaphorically the age of machinery. Nearly all the mechanical inventions and discoveries which are doing the world's work to-day are less than a century old. So rapidly have these inventions and discoveries succeeded each other that the transition from manual labor to machinery has taken place almost without our consciousness. Within the present century the entire coal industry of this continent has been developed, with the resulting multitudinous changes in mechanical, commercial, and domestic affairs. Yet, although the discovery of coal for fuel and illumination is of so recent date, we are already leaving the original discoveries as things of the past and are moving forward to new and better applications of this force. Crude coal will soon be discarded as fuel except under the engine boiler and the ovens of the gas works, and gas will take its place everywhere for fuel, while electricity will supersede gas for illuminating purposes.

This utilization of coal has revolutionized all travel, commerce, and manufacture, and has introduced a new civilization. Steam had been known and used to a limited extent before, but it only put on the harness for earnest work when coal was put under the boiler. The first successful steamboat ever built was the one by Robert Fulton, in 1807, which ran between New York and Albany; and the first steamships which ever crossed the ocean were the Sirius and Great Western, in 1838. The first locomotive engine was built in 1804, and the first railroad, from Manchester to Liverpool, in 1830. The oldest steam railroad in the United States was from Charleston to Hamburg, S. C., which was completed in 1833. Within three quarters of a century the old stagecoach and heavy teams have disappeared from the turnpike and the old sailing vessel from the ocean, except along the coast; and railroads network the land from shore to shore, while lines of fast steamships churn the sea into foam. A century ago great cities could be built only upon deep bays on the coast or at the head of navigation on large rivers, because then all heavy commerce had to be carried on by water.

Then cities like Chicago, Denver, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Atlanta would have been impossible. Now cities spring out of the earth as if by magic wherever agricultural or mineral wealth invites population. Then factories of all kinds had to be built not only near a seaport for the shipment of their products, but also in the valley upon a stream, because water was the only power by which they could be run. Now we build the mill and the factory on the prairie, on the mountain top, or wherever the material to be manufactured abounds. Not only do we travel and trade by machinery, but meanwhile we have learned to write and talk by machinery also. Who realizes that the telegraph is not yet fifty years old? The first telegraph in use was between Washington and Baltimore, in 1844. In 1858 the Atlantic cable was successfully laid, while within the recollection of all the telephone has been invented and utilized, so that to-day the near and the far stand face to face and the world is one vast whispering gallery.

Steam and electricity made possible a wider circulation of the printed page, and at once supply answered demand in new and marvelous machinery for this. The Columbian press, invented by George Clymer, of Philadelphia, and still in use for fine printing, made its appearance in 1818, but this was a hand press. Frederick König, of Saxony, was the first to construct a cylinder machine to run by steam, in 1814. By it eleven hundred impressions could be made per hour, while with Clymer's press only two hundred and fifty impressions per hour could be taken. In 1827 Messrs. Applegath & Cowper constructed a machine in which the type was set upon the surface of a cylinder instead of a plane surface, and this marks the new era in printing. Almost immediately Hoe's cylindrical press appeared in New York. The inventive genius, first of the father and then of the son, added one improvement after another until Hoe's eight and ten cylinder presses of almost absolute perfection completed the series. Were Franklin placed to-day in a great newspaper printing office he would find wheels everywhere, and iron hands doing all the work. Machinery sets the type and inks it; machinery supplies the paper and prints it; machinery cuts off the sheet and folds it; and the result is a quarter of a million papers per day, each a large volume in itself.

Clocks and watches had for ages been employed to mark the flight of time, but no one dreamed that they could be made by machinery. In 1807 a Mr. Terry, of Connecticut, commenced making wooden clocks by machinery. Not long thereafter brass was substituted for wood. About 1838 Chauncey Jerome, of Connecticut, commenced to manufacture one-day brass clocks made entirely by machinery. In 1842 he sent a consignment to England, and since then millions of them have crossed the ocean and ticked off the time in all quarters of the globe. Not, however, until 1850 did any one think that so delicate an instrument as a watch could be made by machinery. Dennison and Howard in that year ventured to make fifty eight-day watches, at Roxbury, Mass. The experiment was a failure, but it was followed by other experiments upon thirty-hour watches, which succeeded. In a few years the machine-made watches had captured the market, and the Swiss and English handmade watches were superseded.

Weaving is an art as old as civilization; but the looms of the ancients were very simple contrivances in which the treadles were worked by the feet and the shuttles were thrown by the hand of the weaver. The Cartwright power loom of 1787, though inaugurating a new era in weaving, was a clumsy thing. Not until the beginning of this century did the power loom take the place of the old hand loom. It was George Crompton who invented the fancy loom in 1837 which has revolutionized weaving. With this marvelous machine, in which machinery winds the bobbins, lifts the warp, and throws the shuttles, the weaver has little to do but stand and supervise the work while iron hands and fingers execute patterns of rare artistic merit.

Husbandry is no longer carried on by manual labor. The sickle, which had been used from the most remote antiquity for reaping, gradually gave way to the mowing and cradling scythes of modern times. In 1826 Rev. Patrick Bell, of Scotland, invented a reaper which is still in use, and is the original from which all subsequent ones have been copied. Notwithstanding the success of this machine, so great was the opposition to its employment by the laboring classes that it fell into disuse. A couple of inventions in this country early in the century met with a similar fate. It was not until 1833 that Obed Hussey patented his reaper, which has nearly supplanted all others, both in America and England, and which is popularly known as the McCormick Reaper. Along with the machine reaper came the threshing machine, harnessed to steam and mounted upon wheels, and made portable. The farmer once walked behind the plow and carried the bag of grain around his neck as he walked over the field sowing his seed. Within the last half century he has learned to sit upon the plow which turns the furrow, and to ride upon the "drill" which plants his grain. The needlework of other days has been supplanted by that of the sewing machine of our times. As late as 1841 Elias Howe patented the first sewing machine, which to-day is sewing not only garments, but shoes, harness, sails, and upholstery of every sort. And what shall I more say? For the time would fail me to tell of the machinery which presses bricks, grooves and planes boards, and even carries the hod to the top of the building; of the machinery that measures grain and grinds flour and kneads bread; of machines which dig railroads and canals, build ships, cars, and wagons, and even break stones for the turnpike; and last, but not least, of the untold machinery for working metal, producing almost every conceivable article from a pin to the shaft of a steamboat. Of all the ages into which history may be divided the nineteenth century is preeminently the age of machinery; and of all the countries in the world the United States is the land of wheels.

Not only are this age and country on literal wheels, but they are run by metaphorical machinery as well. Combinations among men for political, commercial, and mechanical ends are not new, but as old as civilization; yet it remains for our day and country to witness these combinations upon a scale more gigantic than was ever dreamed of before. Indeed, until the discovery of steam and the telegraph men separated by wide distances could not cooperate effectively. Now continents and oceans interpose no barrier, and combinations which girdle the globe can easily be formed and worked; and already the little wheels which heretofore turned independently, each in its limited locality, are being geared together into vast machines whose power makes all the land to tremble. Personal independence and individual influence are swallowed up and lost in corporate power and action. Perhaps this obliteration of the individual is nowhere seen to better advantage than in the army. It used to be that victories were won by the personal bravery and prowess of the individual soldier. To-day the fighting is done by machinery, and the army itself is resolved into a machine. In politics platforms are constructed, the press is subsidized, and opinions are manufactured for the people. An independent candidate stands little chance of election. Even when the party lash becomes unendurable, and men in consequence bolt the caucus and inaugurate independent action, they simply substitute one machine for another. Some concert of action is necessary to success, and perhaps political organizations are inevitable. We only note the fact of the machine in politics without stopping to condemn or approve. In commerce and manufactures great combinations are being formed by which each separate establishment becomes a wheel within a wheel. Syndicates, corporations, and trusts are organized to crush out all competition, to control production and prices, and thus monopolize the market. So gigantic have these combinations become in our day that they trample all opposition under foot, defy the law, corrupt legislatures and Congress, and terrorize judges and juries. So vast is the capital invested in these corporations that small merchants and manufacturers stand no chance in competition. There seems to be nothing to limit such combinations to a single country. With the Atlantic cable binding the two hemispheres together, no reason is apparent why the manufacturers and merchants of the civilized globe may not combine to control the output and the price of every human product, and thus monopolize the markets of the world.

Corresponding with these combinations of capital, the independent laborer is rapidly being absorbed by great labor organizations. Mechanical guilds have existed for centuries in England and in continental Europe, but at first they were little more than local beneficial societies. To-day almost every industry has its laborers organized into an association which covers the continent, and these in turn are only wheels in another great machine which includes the knights of all labor. These organizations propose to control the number of apprentices admitted to each trade, the men to be employed by each establishment, the wages to be paid each employee, and the number of hours constituting a day's work. They do this by strikes, by boycotts, by intimidating employers on the one hand and nonunion men on the other, and sometimes by bloodshed and the wholesale destruction of property. The effect of all such combinations is to obliterate the individual by burying him in the mass. One man may be a much better mechanic than another, but his superior skill avails him little. If he be a member of a labor organization he gets the common wage fixed for that craft, and if he remain outside the organization he cannot get employment.

Even the Church forms no exception to the rule. We have societies for foreign missions, for woman's foreign missions, for home missions; for general church extension and local church extension; for Conference education and general education; for Bible distribution and tract distribution; for the old folks' home, the orphanage, and the hospital; for temperance and "social purity;" and also King's Daughters, Epworth Leagues, and Christian Endeavor societies, with a host of others. Nothing more can be done by the individual. If he would give a loaf of bread to a starving family or a pair of shoes to a barefooted child he must join a society and sign its constitution. Even the various denominations are coming closer together, and are federating for combined action for the conquest of the world.

But the introduction of machinery into all branches of industry and the combination of capital and labor in vast organizations have necessarily wrought a revolution in all kinds of work, and have changed the relations subsisting between capital and labor, between employer and employee. With every mechanical invention large numbers of people find their trades obsolete and their occupations gone. While the manufacture of these machines opens up new fields of labor, and gives employment to large numbers of mechanics, in all cases the introduction of machinery renders the old trade comparatively useless and necessitates the learning of a new one.

Then, again, the trades are divided into various branches, and each mechanic learns only one branch. It is said that there is not a man in all England who can make a gun. One makes the stock, another the barrel, and still another the lock. Even these branches are subdivided again and again. One saws the stock out, another carves it, and still another polishes and paints it. One welds the barrel, another bores it, and still another finishes it. One makes the spring of the lock, another the tumbler, another the hammer, and still another the trigger; while the putting of these parts together is a department distinct from all the rest. The same division of labor is apparent everywhere in this country. The old trades of half a century ago no longer exist. A house carpenter of the olden stamp had to score and hew the timbers for the frame, to groove and plane the boards, to make doors, shutters, and sash, to saw scrolls, rive shingles, and to be architect as well. Now the trade is divided into a dozen branches, and the carpenter needs to learn little more than how to put together the parts, which come to him from the mills, according to the plans which are furnished him. It takes a dozen workers in wood to build a frame house to-day. Each specialist may be a more skilled workman in his department, and the result may be a better building at a smaller cost, but no one of them knows an independent trade. Moreover, he has not acquired skill in handicraft so much as acquaintance with machinery. He is no longer a mechanic, but an operative. The machine does the work and he feeds and runs it. As the mechanic is powerless without tools, so he is dependent upon his machine and is inseparable from it. The inevitable result is to tie the man to a machine, and since each of these does the work only of part of a trade a large number must be bound together in cooperation. This means a factory or mill requiring large capital, in which men are mere operatives, dependent upon their employer.

All machinery, in order to find employment, must be labor-saving; that is, it must accomplish more work of the same kind, and at the same cost, than could be done by hand. It follows either that fewer men must be employed or there must be greater production. If one man with a machine can produce as much as three men working by hand, then either two men must be thrown out of employment or the output must be trebled. One of the men might find employment in the manufacture of the machines, but the other is doomed to idleness, unless production is doubled. If production can be doubled at the same cost, then each man can buy twice as much for his wages, and hence consumption can be doubled. All such machinery would be an unmixed blessing to labor if there was a market for all the product. But where all had the necessaries of life before, this additional amount must be made up of luxuries. While all could double their consumption, all do not and will not, and hence there is overproduction and a glut in the market. When men cannot be induced to purchase the only remedy is to limit production—by shutting down the mills, by running on half time, or by the discharge of some of the operatives. Capital can do without the luxuries of life, and hence can dispense with one half of labor, and live on what it did before the introduction of machinery; but labor cannot go back to its old-time trades and find employment there. The supply of labor is in excess of the demand, and the laborer, therefore, in the power of the capitalist. If we regard all the labor of the country, together with the machinery and the capital engaged in production, as a unity, it is easy to see that society at large will be benefited by the introduction of labor-saving machinery to the extent that production is increased. If the country can produce twice as much at the same cost it has twice as much remuneration for its work. It does not matter whether we double wages and profits, leaving prices the same, or whether we reduce prices by one half and leave wages and profits the same as before. In either case the labor and capital of the country, considered jointly, reap a double harvest. When, however, we consider capital and labor as competitors with each other, and capitalists and laborers as competing among themselves for the lion's share of the profits, we find that the distribution of this increased wealth becomes very unequal. The moment supply exceeds the demand some capital must remain idle and some labor must be unemployed. It does not matter how high wages are to the laborer who has no work, nor how low prices are to the man who has no money; without work he gets no wages, and without wages he gets no bread. Horace Greeley once saw a Swiss peasant cutting grain with a sickle, and said to him, "My dear sir, why don't you get a cradling scythe? You could cut four times as much grain with it." "Well," responded the peasant, "I have not four times as much grain to cut." The peasant was a better political economist than the great New York editor. Before the introduction of machinery all labor was required to supply the demand, and hence no laborer needed to be unemployed. Since machinery multiplies production labor is in excess of the demand, and some must, therefore, stand in the market place all the day idle. To avoid a glut in the market capital combines to limit production. To avoid a glut in the labor market laborers strike for fewer hours as a day's work. They used to work twelve hours a day; now they demand that eight hours shall be the limit. Both movements acknowledge a capacity for and a tendency toward overproduction; and wherever such capacity exists, there labor must suffer for want of employment.

It is not true in an absolute sense that since the introduction of machinery the poor become poorer, while the rich become richer. The laboring classes are better off to-day than ever before. Their labor, coupled with machinery, produces vastly more than formerly, and the purchasing power of their wage is in consequence greater. Notwithstanding they work fewer hours per day, and are not constantly employed, still the poor man's home has many comforts and conveniences which were sadly wanting at the beginning of the century. The truth is that all have become richer, and the poor man has shared in the general wealth. But while the laborer has not absolutely become poorer he has relatively. Riches and poverty are largely relative terms. In general, to be rich is to have more than one's neighbors, and to be poor is to have less. A man with twenty-five thousand dollars in a remote country village is a person of wealth, while in New York city nothing short of five millions will admit him to the circle of the rich. In the large cities a man who can make only ten dollars per week is pitiably poor, while in the country he would be comfortable on five hundred a year. It is not, therefore, any definite amount of money in itself which makes a man either rich or poor, nor yet the purchasing power of such amount of money, but the amount of money which he has as compared with that of other people around him. Our natural wants are few, while our conventional wants are many. We wish to live as other people do; when we cannot do this we are poor by comparison, and our poverty is measured by the disproportion between what we have and what others possess. Estimated in this way the laboring classes are poorer than they were at the beginning of the century. They earn more wages, can purchase more with them, and in consequence enjoy many comforts to which they were formerly strangers; yet the distance between them and their employers grows wider and wider all the time. While machinery has multiplied the production of the country, and while labor has received a share of this increased wealth, capital has taken half a dozen shares.

But great as is the distance between employer and employee in point of wealth the distance in social position is greater still. It used to be that master and man worked side by side at the same bench, ate together at the table and sat side by side in the pew. They visited each other upon terms of equality, and their families intermarried. There were no great corporations or gigantic firms or princely merchants then, employing men by the hundred. The manufacturer had his little mill, the mechanic his little shop, and the merchant his little store, each employing a small number of hands, while in almost every case the employer was himself a laborer in his own place of business. The apprentice who learned a trade or the clerk who learned a business generally had his board and lodging with his employer and was received into his family on terms of equality. Now all this is changed. The little stores are being swallowed up by the larger ones, the mechanic's little shop is superseded by the great factory, and the little mills are united together into one gigantic trust. Men are employed, supervised, and paid by an agent of the company. The employer never comes into contact with them. In hundreds of cases he does not know the men either by sight or by name. Any social intercourse between his family and theirs is out of the question. They live in tenement houses down by the factory; he lives in a marble palace up on the avenue.

We know that there are many exceptions to the customs which we have described, but that the trend of the times is steadily toward a wider separation between employer and employee cannot reasonably be doubted. A man takes rank according to the machine he runs. If a mechanical machine, he belongs to the class of laborers, and if a metaphorical machine, he takes rank as a capitalist. Machines of one kind or another have rent society asunder and put an impassable gulf between its extremes. Hence we have, as descriptive of the different divisions, the un-American terms, "the classes" and "the masses," "capital and labor," "employer and employee," "the four hundred" and "the rabble." Labor has been revolutionized by the introduction of machinery, and has suffered social degradation as the consequence.

Perhaps the most serious political and religious problem of the age is to be found in the relative positions of capital and labor. The two classes have drifted apart until each regards the other as an antagonist. Each seeks its own interest regardless of the other, and each invokes the aid of government in furtherance of its ends. Capital has money and influence with which to corrupt legislatures, and labor holds the ballots with which to elect them. In the political struggle between them no prophet can foretell the outcome. Labor seems sullen on account of real or fancied wrongs, and is determined to revolutionize legislation in its interest. Capital, on the contrary, is alert, and has its lobbyists in legislatures and places of power supplied with funds to shape all measures for its benefit. If corruption on the one hand shall lead to violence on the other the conflict will be one which will shake society to its center and endanger the very existence of our form of government.

A similar condition of things exists in the Church. Employer and employee no longer worship at the same altar. If both are Christians, as a rule they attend different churches, the one belonging to what is popularly known as a "rich man's church" and the other to the "poor man's church." Such separation is so manifestly unchristian that large bodies of workingmen attend no church, and are coming to look upon the Church as their enemy rather than their friend. Let no one delude himself with the idea that all such are foreigners and anarchists of despicable character, who hate the Church only because it condemns their vile practices. There are hundreds of thousands of native Americans and law-abiding citizens who never darken the doors of our churches. Many of them were reared in Christian homes and are themselves nominal Christians. They send their children to the Sunday school and teach them the principles of the Christian faith, but they will not humiliate themselves by attending a church which is controlled by wealth, in which they are treated with condescension, contempt, or patronage. The result is the strange spectacle of large bodies of men who reverence the name of Christ but hate the Christian Church. The question so often discussed in religious assemblies of the way in which to reach the masses, and the changing methods adopted for this purpose, are a practical confession that the Church has drifted away from these masses and is no longer in touch with them.

At the bottom of the whole difficulty, both in politics and religion, lies the changed relation between capital and labor resulting from the introduction of machinery into all industries. The remedy is not to be found in the removal of machinery, for neither capital nor labor would consent to go back to the old methods, with the consequent loss of production. Some scheme must be devised by which a workman can run a machine without being degraded to the level of a machine, and by which he shall get his full share of the increased production of machinery. Any adjustment which promises the accomplishment of these ends will bind employer and employee together in common interest and mutual respect. In the State they will then be fellow-citizens seeking to uphold the government with equal patriotism, while in the Church they will be brethren in their Father's house.

What wages shall be is the one great question which is agitating society to its depths, and upon the solution of which the stability and peace of the nation depend.

While the old industrial régime continued supply and demand, competition and contract, solved the whole labor question to the satisfaction of both employer and employee. So long have these economic principles been employed that they have come to be regarded as axiomatic truths. They lie at the basis of our whole industrial and commercial system, and are supposed to embody ultimate truth. But, notwithstanding their venerable age and their hitherto universal acceptance, the changed relations of society, resulting from the introduction of machinery, to-day challenge their accuracy as a measure of right and deny their ability to solve the wage problem either satisfactorily or justly. We know that to question these economic principles is to assault the foundations of society; but if the foundations are unsound the sooner they are removed the better.

What does the phrase "supply and demand" mean as an arbiter in the wage question to-day? Since machines in almost every industry do the work of half a dozen men, the supply of labor is always in excess of the demand. In a new country like ours, where land is to be cleared, railroads and turnpikes constructed, rivers bridged and cities built, the men thus thrown out of employment can measurably find employment at something else. But even here, with all these advantages, there is constantly an army of men out of employment. Proof of this is found in the rapidity with which the place of strikers is supplied and in the number of applicants answering any advertisement of a situation. If already the supply is in excess of the demand what will it be when the country is fully populated, its industries stereotyped, and no new avenues open to labor? With three men seeking work where there is only work for one, the question of supply and demand as a rule by which to determine the wage of the worker becomes a club in the hand of the employer with which to beat the laborer down to starvation rates. Under this system the more work a man has the more wages he gets, and the less he has to do the less he gets for doing even that—a strange fulfillment, though foreign to its meaning, of the Scriptural passage, "For he that hath, to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath."

"Competition and contract," with a glut in the labor market —what do they mean for the toilers? Simply that each man will underbid the other until the limit is reached at which he can live. Any wages on which life can be sustained are better than no work with starvation. The question is not as to what his work is worth, or what the man can earn for his employer, but simply what he can get, and the lowest bidder gets the work. He bargains, it is true, to take the wage which he gets; it was a fair contract; he may even have named the figure himself; but will our sense of justice say that such competition and contract secure for him the wage which he ought to have? Esau, at starvation's door, sold his birthright for a mess of pottage; but will any man affirm that because he signed the contract the transaction was righteous? If so, then Shylock had a right to his pound of flesh, because it was "so nominated in the bond."

Nothing is ever settled until it is settled aright. There is a deep feeling in the mind of the working classes everywhere that they have been defrauded by their employers; not that they do not receive the wage for which they bargained, but that such wage is not their fair share of the profits. When, as at Homestead, the strikers take possession of the mill, and deny the right of the owner to introduce other men without their consent, they are simply expressing an undefined conviction that they have some property in the mill. If questioned their crude thought will be something like this: "Our labor, coupled with the capital of our employer, built that mill, and we, therefore, have some rights in it."

"But did you not get the wages agreed upon for your work?"

"Yes, but our work was worth more than we received. We only earned a bare living, while our employer has become a millionaire."

It is only another way of saying they did not get their fair share of the joint product of his capital and their labor. They understand that they received all that the law will allow them; they know that they have no legal claim upon the mill; but still there is a vague conviction that the equities of the case have not been satisfied. If the employer had not made so much they would have been satisfied with less. But if he rolls in wealth derived from the profits of their labor, while they remain poor, they will always feel that a part of what is his in law belongs of right to them.

In monarchical countries, where the masses are ruled by the classes and where popular education does not obtain, all such feelings may be suppressed by the strong arm of government, and the demands of labor may be ignored by capital; but in a country like ours, with free schools and government, these muttering protests of the masses will make themselves heard and understood in the halls of legislation and will take shape in articulate legal enactments. If the law oppresses the lawmakers they will soon change the law. This inchoate feeling of labor that a just wage cannot be determined by competition and contract, but that the product of labor ought to be equitably divided between capital and labor, has already forced recognition, and the justness of its claim has been measurably conceded. The sliding scale of wages adopted in many of our mines and mills, by which the worker gets less when profits are small and more when profits are great, concedes the whole claim that the just wage of the workman is not a fixed sum, but a certain proportion of the profits. What proportion of the profits labor should receive in any given industry is a very complicated question, and one which will depend for its answer upon a large variety of conditions; but the principle of an equitable division of the product between capital and labor has already forged to the front and forced recognition. More and more must this principle dominate the labor market and be incorporated into the law of the land.

Not without protest, however, will this principle win its way. The capitalist demands, "Am I not entitled to all that is left after the workmen have been paid as much as they could have elsewhere made? If by my superior ability in management I can increase the productiveness of the concern, may I not justly claim all the profits above what the same labor could produce elsewhere? If John Smith pays his workmen all his business will warrant, and I pay my hands as much as he, then all the balance belongs to me. Business ability should have its reward." Yes, if, unaided, it can earn one; but when such ability depends upon and unites with labor in order to secure a reward, then that reward must be equitably divided between them. Capital and management are as powerless without labor as labor without them. It is what the two jointly produce that is to be divided. Why then shall the profits which John Smith can make from his capital and the labor of his workmen be made the standard by which to determine the wage of other workmen? It may be that John Smith is incompetent to manage the business. Most assuredly he is if another man can take the same workmen and double the profits. And is the workman then entitled only to the wage which his labor under incompetent management can produce, while when the business is properly managed all profits in excess of this belong to the management? This is simply saying that the laborer must share all the losses in the business, but must have no share in the profits. What if John Smith should make nothing beyond his living, and in consequence not be able to pay any wages at all; must the men in the successful establishment work for nothing because John Smith can afford to pay no more? Why not begin at the other end of the line, with the amount which the business competently managed will afford, and make that the standard for determining the amount of wages for workmen in that industry? It is true John Smith could not afford to pay it, and would have to go out of the business. But if his incapacity is robbing the laborer of what he could make under better management, then he ought to go out of business and take his place among the workmen, where he belongs. No standard wage can, with any show of justice, be established upon any other basis than an equitable division of the product of labor with average ability in the management of the business. If the manager have exceptional ability, and if his talents must have as their reward all that he can make more than the average competitor, then, in all fairness, a manager who falls below the average in business capacity ought to bear all the deficiency resulting from his incapacity. Equity demands one of two things: either a sliding scale by which labor shares all the profits and losses or a standard wage based upon average profits when the business is conducted with average ability. But as the money value of any standard will be a variable quantity the wage must be not a fixed sum of money but a definite proportion of the product.

The statement so often and so confidently made that capital is compelled to assume all risks and bear all losses, and therefore is entitled to all the profits, is without foundation in fact. The laborer, in his measure, shares all the risks and losses in the business. Let prices decline, and a reduction in wages is sure to follow. Let there be a dull market, and the mills shut down or run on half time. Let the employer fail, and the workmen are thrown out of employment and frequently lose their overdue pay. Their loss, severally, may be small compared with that of the capitalist, but in the aggregate it may be, and often is, greater than his. If, then, there is no security for their wages when the business is run at a loss, there can be no reason for excluding them from a share in the profits over and above the standard wage when the business prospers. Not a few large employers are beginning to feel the force of this reasoning and are recognizing the principle by distributing a dividend among their employees at the end of the year. What is now done in this respect in exceptional cases, voluntarily and as an act of generosity, remains to be established as the rule.

It will be objected that these workingmen would only spend their share of the profits in drink and debauchery. Yet this objection is a double-edged sword which cuts both ways. What does the employer do with the money? The number of employers is small compared with that of laborers, but perhaps the proportion of them who spend their money viciously is as great. The only question before us, however, is not what use will be made of the money, but to whom it belongs. If the workman has a right to a share in the profits no man can justly withhold it from him. Such affected patronage is nothing less than robbery, and it is poor atonement for the crime to take a part of the money and build a workingmen's library, or to bequeath it at death to charitable and religious purposes. A just wage cannot be fixed by supply and demand, nor by competition and contract, nor yet can it be left to generosity and charity. It has its taproot down in the equities of the case. If industrial commodities are the joint product of capital and labor, then each owns a certain share of them, proportioned to the contribution which each made in their production. That share is not any fixed sum of money, irrespective of the market value of the product, but a fixed share of the product, variable in value according to the market. An advance in wages where the wage is a certain fixed sum of money does not necessarily mean an improvement in the pecuniary condition of the wage-earner. He may often get much larger pay and yet be no better off. Suppose the price of wages in all industries were doubled; as the market value of an article depends upon the amount of labor entering into it the price of every commodity would also be instantly doubled; so that the double wage would buy no more now than the single wage did before. It is useless, therefore, to attempt to quell the rising discontent of labor by showing that wages are higher now than formerly, or by offering an additional increase to their present money value. The workman wants what his labor produced, be its money value small or great, and not until he is satisfied that he gets it will labor agitations cease, nor will the public conscience feel that they ought to cease.

To determine the precise equities between capital and labor is the greatest problem of the age, and he who succeeds in solving it will be the greatest benefactor of the race. Perhaps civilization is not yet ripe for its solution. But while we may not be able to formulate the law of equity in the case with exactness we can discover where it lies and approximately outline it. The gigantic trusts, syndicates, and corporations of the day have themselves eliminated one of the most perplexing factors of the problem. It used to be that the capitalist and manager of the business were one and the same, and then the question which defied solution was how much of the success of the business was due to the management. But in all these great companies capital is separated from the management. The owners of the stock do not run the business, but employ an agent for that purpose at a fixed salary. The amount of profits due to the management, therefore, is a fixed sum which leaves the balance to be divided simply between capital and labor.

Let us take a standard industry of the country—for example, the manufacture of cotton goods—as an illustration, and attempt the solution of the problem. Suppose the plant with its machinery to be worth $125,000, the raw material used per annum $500,000, and the capital required to run the business $200,000, while the number of hands employed is 500. At the end of the year the output of the mill is ascertained to have been $800,000, exclusive of all commissions and freight paid to market it. How would a court of equity distribute that amount? In the first place, the raw material must be paid for. Then the rental value of the mill, including ordinary wear and tear and necessary repairs, amounting to about $10,000, must be deducted. After this, insurance, both on the plant and stock, must be paid, aggregating some $2,000. Then the manager must be paid his salary, about $8,000. Next a fund should be created to replace obsolete machinery and to cover all possible loss by accident in the business. This should be an undivided fund, belonging neither to employer nor employees, but to the concern, and should not be used for the improvement of the plant, which is the sole property of the capitalist. Let this fund be made ample, so as to give the capitalist as good security for his money as any other investment. Suppose, for this purpose, we set aside $20,000 per annum. Finally, add for fuel, light, tax, office and traveling expenses, and for incidentals $6,000, making in all $546,000. Now, the capitalist has nothing left in the business but simply $200,000 in money, for which he has as good security as any other investment could furnish. To what rate is he entitled for the use of his money? The public conscience, which has enacted a legal rate for each State, has thus decided that that is all the money is worth. But suppose we grant forty per cent more, to cover any possible risk which such investment may involve more than another. Five per cent. is all that first-class security will pay; let us give the employer seven per cent. This will make his share $14,000. Deducting all these amounts from the value of the output, we have left $240,000 to be divided among the laborers. It is what their toil produced; it belongs of right to them; it is their just wage and remains to be divided among them, not equally, but equitably, according to the relative value of each man's labor in producing the output. This amount is thirty per cent of the value of the finished product. The figures which we have named may not be accurate; they may be too great in some cases and too small in others; but their sum total will not vary very widely from the truth. After all other claims have been met something like thirty per cent of the output will be left as the amount due to labor. With this amount, be its money value small or great, labor must be content, except that whatever surplus there may be in the fund set apart to cover losses by accident and for improved machinery belongs to labor and must be distributed in dividends among the workmen. Or, better still, having thus determined approximately the relative share of capital, labor, and management, deduct from the value of the entire output all fixed claims and then divide what is left among these three in the proportion which each sustains to the other, namely, capital, 3; labor, 30; and management, 1.

Should it be objected that this plan is impracticable, because the workmen could not wait till the end of the year for their wages, while the amount to which they are entitled could not be ascertained before, the answer is that if the principle be correct its practice will not be impossible. Let a minimum wage, agreed upon, be drawn weekly and the balance at the end of the quarter or six months or year, whenever the amount due them can be ascertained. This is precisely what is done now by the partners in nearly all business firms. That some such plan is feasible is rendered indubitable by the cooperative establishments already in successful operation. Let the experiment be made upon a large scale and the results be carefully tabulated, and in a quarter of a century the proportionate value of labor to the finished product in any given industry could be determined as accurately as the value of any other commodity. The combined labor and capital of the country produce annually sufficient to give every person a comfortable living, with a considerable surplus for luxuries. It needs only that an equitable division should be made—that each man should be given the share which his labor or skill or capital has contributed to the general wealth—to satisfy the public conscience and to secure general contentment. Since the vast syndicates, trusts, and corporations which control the industries of the land are created by law and constantly invoke the powers of government to protect their rights, it is only just that the law should provide against the abuse of their privileges by requiring that they shall neither overcharge the public on the one hand nor underpay their employees on the other. We sadly mistake the trend of the times if there is not a steady march toward the enactment of statutes which shall determine the wage of the workman and give him a claim, in a court of equity, for a fair share of the profits. Bellamy's Looking Backward is causing many men to look forward. His dream may be Utopian in many respects, but there is much in it, nevertheless, capable of realization. In a government like ours, where the people are sovereign, Vulcan, and not Pluto, must ultimately reign. The man with the paper cap, the hammer, and the leathern apron is elbowing his way to the front amid a wilderness of wheels, compelling the recognition of his manhood and the dignity of labor. It may be that under the present industrial régime labor gets its full share of the profits in many cases, and where it does not the employer is not so much to blame as the system which necessitates the grinding down of labor. But the old system is rapidly becoming effete and is giving way to something better. The eastern sky is already streaked with gray, foretelling a new industrial day. The old order changeth. Get ready for the new.

Art. VI.—THE RELATIONS AND RESULTS OF OUR EARLY MISSIONARY WORK IN OREGON.

The relation of our early missionary work on the North Pacific coast to the Americanization of Oregon and its social and educational culture is a part of our history which has not hitherto received that careful analysis and plain statement that its importance demands. The writer desires in this paper to supply this deficiency, and so give the work its proper credit, not only as an agency of purely spiritual influence, but also as almost the only embodiment and representative of American principles during the determining struggle between the United States and Great Britain for the ownership of Oregon.

Two things may be premised: Our review of this subject must proceed from a purely historic standpoint and be largely summarizations of facts rather than elaborate and historical discussions of them. Also, if we write almost exclusively of our Methodist Episcopal missionary work on this coast, we do not forget or ignore the fact that the same things here written about our work would be true in their measure of the work of other American missions in the same field.

Leading up to our subject a few undisputed statements of history should be made:

1. Oregon, by which name, as used in this paper, we understand all the region of country west of the Rocky Mountains and north of the forty-second degree of north latitude as far as the forty-ninth degree, was practically unknown to the lettered world up to 1792, only one hundred years ago, when Captain Robert Gray, commanding the Boston ship Columbia, discovered the mouth of the great river of the West and named it "Columbia," after the vessel he commanded.

2. Nothing was understood of the geographical or topographical character of its great interior until, under the orders of President Jefferson, Captains Lewis and Clark crossed the summits of the Rocky Mountains, and, striking the head waters of the Columbia, followed it downward until they reached the Pacific Ocean, on the 15th of November, 1805, only eighty-seven years ago.

3. The first effort to establish a localized commercial interest in Oregon was made by the Pacific Fur Company, under the direction of John Jacob Astor, in the founding of "Astoria," in 1811, a little less than eighty-two years ago.

4. During the last war between the United States and Great Britain, in 1814, Astoria, including all its merchandise of every description, was disposed of by its resident partners of Mr. Astor, who were British subjects, to the Northwestern Company, a British corporation. The American name, Astoria, was superseded by the British name, "Fort George," and the British flag took the place of the Stars and Stripes.

5. By a consolidation of the Northwestern Company with the Hudson's Bay Company, another corporation operating under letters patent from the British crown, the Hudson's Bay Company not only secured a complete monopoly of the trade of the valley of the Columbia, but became the recognized representative of British pretensions to the ownership of the country itself; so that from 1821 to 1848, the period historically known as that of "joint occupancy," that company was the very right arm of British power in its fierce struggle against the ownership of the country by the United States.

6. The Hudson's Bay Company, thus constituted, was one of the most powerful commercial monopolies in the world. Its commercial capital reached millions, and its partners, clerks, and servants numbered high into the thousands, when, on the 19th of October, 1834, nearly fifty-nine years ago, the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the person of her noble representative, Jason Lee, opened her evangel of light in an established mission that embodied and typified both American civilization and evangelical Christianity in the sight at once of the unrelieved paganism of untold ages and the un-American and un-Protestant power which had held the destiny of Oregon in its grip of steel so long. And these were the contesting forces that here and there entered the lists in the great intellectual and moral tournament which was to decide the social, religious, and national destiny of Oregon.

From this historical standpoint we are now prepared to study first the relations of our missionary work thus established to the Americanization of Oregon. What we mean by the "Americanization of Oregon" is the settlement of the question of the ownership of the country, which had been so long in controversy between the United States and Great Britain, in favor of the United States, thus making it American and not British territory. Previous to the establishment of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Oregon, in 1834, a number of attempts had been made to establish American commercial interests and American settlements in the valley of the Columbia. The three historically most prominent and most ably sustained were that of the Pacific Fur Company, at the head of which was John Jacob Astor, in 1811; that of Captain Bonneville, an officer of the United States army, on furlough for that purpose, and having the quasi support of the government, together with the patronage of some of the most prominent merchants of New York, in 1832-34; and that of Mr. Nathaniel Wyethe, who invested a large private fortune, for that time, in his enterprise, besides having strong financial and moral support from the wealth and culture of Boston. But for reasons that will soon appear these were all utter failures, and when Mr. Lee introduced himself to Dr. John McLoughlin, the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company west of the Rocky Mountains, on September 15, 1834, there was really nothing of American influence in the entire region over which this able governor presided. Therefore when those two men met that day there stood face to face causes and destinies of wonderful import to Oregon, and even to civilization itself, the world over.

They were both typical and representative men. One was Scotch-English, with all the stalwart grip and force of that splendid blood. The other was of pure New England parentage, a revised and improved edition of the Anglo-Saxon of the seagirt isle. Each stood over six feet in height and looked on a level into the other's eyes. Seldom in all history have two such splendid representatives of opposing forces and antagonistic purposes stood face to face with each other as in the case of these two men. One is tempted to stand and gaze long upon this strange moral and intellectual tableau thus thrown against the foreground of an opening and against the background of a departing era; for when their hands clasped it was suggestive of the old unconsciously welcoming the new, and the new almost as unconsciously bidding the old adieu.

Dr. McLoughlin, as the representative of the Hudson's Bay Company, and hence the embodiment of British power and purpose in Oregon, could not meet Mr. Lee as he could and did meet Mr. Nathaniel Wyethe. The cases and the causes were entirely dissimilar. Mr. Wyethe came with merchandise —came as a trader—to set up a rival establishment within sound of the morning guns of Fort Vancouver. Mr. Lee came as a missionary to bring help and moral uplift to degraded men. Mr. Wyethe had arms in his hands; Mr. Lee had ideas and moral purposes in his mind and heart. The one could be met with arms if necessary, and the Hudson's Bay Company be thus rid of the annoyance of his commercial opposition, and Britain of the more hated pestilence of his Americanism. The other could only be met by ideas and moral purposes better than Dr. McLoughlin's own. One cannot shoot an idea to death, he cannot kill a moral influence with gunpowder; and, besides, those who knew Dr. McLoughlin in his lifetime knew very well that his moral nature was far superior to the purposes and work of the soulless corporation of which he was then the executive head. Still, justice requires the statement that it is not probable that Dr. McLoughlin was well enough skilled in moral casuistry or sufficiently acquainted with the history and results of missionary enterprises in other parts of the world to comprehend the meaning to the future history of this coast that was wrapped up in the white folds of Mr. Lee's commission. Otherwise he might have hindered when he helped, and thwarted when he counseled and upheld.

It is not our purpose in this paper to follow in detail the history of our early missionary work further than to show how potentially this and succeeding missionary establishments became the nucleus around which gathered whatever there was of American life and purpose in Oregon for ten years or more following 1834. Hence the story of that work as it related to the Indian population will be entirely omitted here.

After two years and a half of most self-denying, but still hopefully successful, work by Messrs. Jason Lee, Daniel Lee, Cyrus Shepard, and P. L. Edwards, in establishing this mission, three men and three women were added to their numbers by appointment of our missionary board, arriving in Oregon in May, 1837. The first marriage of a white man to a white woman in Oregon took place on the 16th of July following. The contracting parties were Jason Lee and Miss Anna Maria Pittman, the pioneer American missionary thus becoming the pioneer American home builder in the valley of the Willamette. On the same day Mr. Cyrus Shepard and Miss Susan Downing, both of the mission, were married. In September following Rev. David Leslie, accompanied by his wife and several children, a thorough New England family, having some of the best blood of old Massachusetts flowing in their veins, arrived. These were the beginnings of American home life in this valley. Did not this mean something for American civilization in Oregon? We shall see further on, though we must pass through the work of years in single sentences. Up to this time there had scarcely been the semblance of a home, as we understand that word, in Oregon. But here were educated and cultivated white women, accustomed to the refinements of the parlors of Boston and Lynn, of Newark and New York, able to grace any social life, as well as aid in lifting up a fallen and degraded race. Thus an American community, with all the elements of increase and perpetuity in itself, was established in the very heart of Oregon—consisting of men, women, and children, with homes, schools, and worship, with flocks and herds and plows and harvests—peaceably but successfully confronting the rule of the British Hudson's Bay Company over the fair realm it had dominated so long. In less than three years more fifty-one other persons, including thirteen families, were added to this settlement. Thus, in less than six years after its first missionary contingent of three men had reached Oregon, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church had not only planted an American community in Oregon, but had made it so strong that it was ineradicable, doing what fur traders and commercial adventurers and even the United States government had failed to do in fifty years of effort.

Having thus summarily noted the beginning and traced the development of this entirely and intensely American force in Oregon up to the autumn of 1840, we are in possession of the following facts: The entire number of adults, men and women, that our missionary board had transplanted from the best life of the old States into Oregon was forty, constituting not far from twenty American homes. Probably these homes held at that time not far from sixty children, born to an inheritance of American patriotism which certainly would not be diminished when they contrasted their own with the homes of those who disputed with them the dominion of Oregon.

Meantime, to understand the true position and measure the actual work of this American missionary community, we should know what the Hudson's Bay Company, as representing British pretensions to Oregon, had been doing during the six years in which this formidable and opposing force had been developing before it. Surely such astute leaders and such faithful men as McLoughlin and Douglas, intrusted by their company and by their government with such vast mercantile and national interests, could not be insensible or indifferent to the ominous threat against those interests involved in the very presence of these American missionary communities near them. Two things they did, both in themselves well chosen for the end they sought. First, they introduced, in 1838, two French Canadian Roman Catholic priests. These were British subjects, and, of course, strongly in favor of British and against American rule in Oregon. Second, in 1842 they brought a colony of one hundred and twenty-five persons, also British subjects, from Winnipeg, to settle in Oregon and attach themselves to its soil. Thus, at the two points where that great company feared the influence of the American missions the most, they made the most strenuous efforts to counteract that influence. They knew the greatness of the prize at issue, and they were not men to neglect any fair means to win that prize for the country they represented. We are not complaining of this action, but are simply recording it. There is a measure of honor that we accord them. They did what they could, and in the best way they could, to counteract the influence which they could not but see must, if left unchecked, give the long-disputed Oregon, coveted equally by England and the United States, to the latter nation. Their faithfulness to their trust was honorable.

We are now in a position to study with something of intelligence the elements that entered into and finally decided the struggle for Oregon. There were two: the one was political, British against American; the other was religious, Romanist against Protestant—British and Romanist, American and Protestant. Thus they stood in array over against each other. It seems a strange coincidence, but history can make no other record of that period of the struggle for Oregon. The claims and interests of Great Britain at this period, it is safe to say, were sustained by a greater number of people than were those of the United States. But they were a conglomerate of various colors and cultures, with little of moral or social adhesiveness. Noble and cultured white men, English and Scotch, mostly, were in the lead, but their followers were largely French Canadians, or half-castes from the Red River country. Their social and home life seemed to weaken rather than strengthen the moral and intellectual fiber of the best men among them. The traders, the chief factors, and even the governor himself, were as the voyageurs and trailmen in this regard. Their children were, as a body, without any large and worthy ambition—too high to be Indians and too low to be white men. Among them all there was not a single white wife and mother. On the side of the American community, embodied up to this time, and later, in the missions and missionaries, there was a homogeneity of moral and intellectual and national idea that gave it the strength of welded steel. They were among the hardiest and most aspiring people of the New World. They had been trained in the furrows and in the shops and at the forges where human frames are annealed unto endurance and tempered into elasticity. They were educated. Many, both men and women, had high literary ability and culture. They had ambition, that supreme energizer which forever lifts great souls toward the skies. They comprehended their responsibility and accurately measured their opportunity. And this was the body of men who stood undauntedly for American interests and supremacy in Oregon against the great Hudson's Bay Company, representing British interests and supremacy. Can we not now see the moral and philosophical reason for the final issue of the struggle?

We have carried the parallel and contrast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the American missions only down to 1840, because after that date comparatively few persons were added to the original missionary force in Oregon, and for two or three years following the "missionary influence," as it was called, was at its zenith. But the relative power of the Hudson's Bay Company grew less, and its grip on the destiny of Oregon was forever loosened.

The writer would not detract from the praise due any man, or any class of men, for labor on behalf of early Oregon, nor would he add to the laurels of any one more than is his due; but, up to this period, the American interest in Oregon owed more to the work and influence of Jason Lee than to those of any other one man, if not, indeed, of all other men in the country combined. He was really the corypheus of the American community, as was Dr. McLoughlin of the Hudson's Bay Company influence. Being first in the field, he very early made himself acquainted with the country from the Umpqua to Puget Sound and from the ocean to the Rocky Mountains. His manuscript journal, now open before me, shows that he estimated highly the agricultural capabilities of the country, and especially of the Willamette valley, and as early as 1835 believed it would soon be occupied by a civilized people. His correspondence with the Board of Missions, under whose directions he labored, which was published in New York in 1835-38, also evidenced this conviction. Following up his belief upon this point, in 1838 he returned overland to the States, and before the missionary board in New York, in the public prints, and before great audiences, from Maine to South Carolina, and from Boston to St. Louis, set forth the character, needs, and advantages of Oregon. He spent a full year in this employment, visiting Washington and conferring with the secretary of state and the secretary of war, and receiving substantial aid from the officers of the general government for the furtherance of the purpose for which he was in the East—the organization and equipment of a strong reinforcement for his missionary work in Oregon. His purpose was completely successful, and in October of 1839 he sailed from New York in a ship chartered by the missionary board, with what was really an American colony—ministers, mechanics, farmers, teachers—and with supplies for the work upon which they had engaged, to the value of twenty-five thousand dollars. It was the largest and best equipped company that, on such a purpose, had ever sailed from any port; and when it reached its western destination in 1840, with Mr. Lee at its head, it morally fixed the national status of Oregon, because it put the American influence far in advance of the British.

sionary stations to the Americanization of Oregon it is necessary to notice. It is this: these stations became the centers around which gathered all there was of American sentiment or American people in the country. This was especially true of the Willamette station. True to its purpose, and the nation under whose charter it pursued that purpose, the Hudson's Bay Company would do nothing to induce or foster American settlement. While it would sell its goods to Americans it would buy nothing of them. This was the surest system of antagonism it could possibly have adopted. It had forced the Americans out of the country before the missionary stations were established, and, until an organization able to cope with itself in mercantile operations could take up the work of colonization, it could keep them out. Rivalry in trade it did not fear, for that it could easily withstand. But the missionary establishments, while independent and self-supporting, were not trading posts. The Hudson's Bay Company could not prevent the ministry of hospitality which the missionaries were always ready to exercise toward their countrymen, and all others, indeed, who came to their doors or pitched their tents under the shadows of their sanctuary. Hence, though the missionaries were not traders, nor their stations depots of commerce, they became, in the only way in which rivalry could have been successful, the rivals of that mighty monopoly; and by the time any considerable number of American citizens were prepared to follow the path the missionaries had blazed out into the valleys of Oregon the latter had prepared an asylum for them and broken the right arm of the power of the Hudson's Bay Company. Never afterward did it, or the British nation it had so ably and faithfully represented, recover its supremacy in Oregon. Morally the contest was ended, and Oregon was Americanized. It remained only for a treaty between England and the United States to register this moral decision, and this was soon done.

But the full influence and importance of our early missionary work in Oregon cannot be understood unless we consider its relation to the social and educational culture of the country, as well as to its Americanization. As this branch of our theme is so broad in itself, and requires so extended and philosophical a treatment for its full understanding, we can here review it only in part. The elements of this class of culture are discovered in two things—persons and the work they perform. There is never a creation without a creator; there is never a social state without a social being who is the creator of it; there is never an intellectual culture without a culturing intellect to produce it. We can therefore best consider this question in the following order: first, the persons, men and women whom our Missionary Society gave to Oregon, and, secondly, the work which they accomplished.

While we count the strictly missionary era of our work in Oregon to have closed with the organization of a regular Annual Conference in 1853, we do not by any means limit the relations and influence of that work on the social and educational culture of Oregon to that period. It was germinal rather than final and finished, and has touched and molded every subsequent period up to and including the present even more potentially than it did its own. Within this classification who were the men and the women thus given by our Missionary Society to Oregon? Let us write their names, for the pen that lingers on the names of heroes becomes itself heroic. Of ministers there were Jason Lee, Daniel Lee, David Leslie, H. K. W. Perkins, J. P. Richmond, J. H. Frost, Alvan F. Waller, Gustavus Hines, George Gary, William Roberts, James H. Wilbur, Nehemiah Doane, Thomas H. Pearne, Isaac Dillon, J. W. Miller, F. S. Hoyt, C. S. Kingsley, J. F. Devore, William Royal, T. F. Royal, J. W. Hines, H. K. Hines, P. G. Buchanan—a quarter of a hundred men each of whom brought with him a Deborah, or a Miriam, or a Hannah, or a Lydia, or a Dorcas, or a Lois, or a Eunice, or a Monica, or a Susannah Wesley, or a Madam Guyon, or any of the noble sisterhood of the ancient or the modern Church. Of laymen there were Cyrus Shepard, P. L. Edwards, H. B. Brewer, Dr. I. L. Babcock, James Olley, J. L. Parrish, who afterward became a minister; Hamilton Campbell, whose honored widow still graces her place in the Christian life of the city of Portland, and whose daughter, Mrs. Maria Smith, by her personal devotion and her large benefactions has put her name in such noble relief that the historian of Methodism in Oregon will be compelled to write her name by the side of the most "elect ladies" in the Church; and, named last because in some sense crowning all, George Abernethy, the first American Governor of Oregon.

Let us select from this list a few names and give the men who bore them the limning of a sentence:

Jason Lee, standing six feet three inches in stature, with a frame of molded steel, open, strong, manly face, his blue Saxon eye looking squarely and calmly into the flushed and noble face of Dr. McLoughlin—a very king of men—and preaching his revered and beloved Christ with equal power to high and low alike, the man of whom Dr. Fisk, when the man—the providential man—to found the Oregon Mission was sought, wrote: "I know but one man, Jason Lee." This companion and confidant of Osmon C. Baker, Miner Raymond, and others like them, this student and spiritual disciple of Fisk at Wilbraham, took into the deep wilds of Oregon in 1834 a nature of breadth and power that eminently fitted him to be a founder of empire as well as a successful minister of Christ, both of which he actually became.

Following Lee in the superintendency of the mission came George Gary. Who and what was he? In our boyhood and early manhood we could enter no Methodist cottage or palace from the Hudson to Lake Erie, or from Canada to Pennsylvania, where the name of George Gary was not held as the synonym for gentleness and loveliness of life and for eloquence and power in the pulpit. Short in stature, yet broad of shoulder and deep of chest, his round white face was as open as the sky, his full blue eye as clear as the light, his smile a sunbeam; and when we knew him his silver hair was a bannered crown upon his head in the midst of his impassioned oratory. He nearly reached the highest honors of his Church, and beautifully and sweetly would he have graced them. Such was George Gary, the second superintendent of the Oregon Mission.

To speak or write of William Roberts one needs his own purity and precision of rhetoric, his own superbly trained and perfectly modulated voice, his clear and ringing enunciation that never missed a tone nor made a discord. For forty years that splendid voice and cultured oratory proclaimed a Gospel neither added to nor taken from, with the same logical precision and the same effectiveness of appeal, in the schoolhouses, in the cabins, in the groves, or in the city pulpits throughout Oregon. He was the third and last superintendent of the Oregon Mission.

Alvan F. Waller was another man who stood full six feet in height. Lithe, sinewy, alert, indomitable; with clear insight and calm, trustful outlook; with a penetrating thought that never missed the heart of the truth nor mistook its covering for its core; with a directness and power of appeal that often smote like an unexpected thunderbolt; immovable as granite yet elastic as tempered steel, he left an impress on the life of his age in Oregon such as but few men are able to make.

Gustavus Hines, the Conference classmate in old Genesee of Waller, and his lifelong friend and companion, should be mentioned by his side. They came to Oregon together, they wrought hand in hand, and they sleep the honored sleep but a few feet apart. Strong in both body and mind, a presence that gave the world assurance of a man perfectly devoted to an evangelical ministry, a preacher of great thoughtfulness and power, a writer of more than ordinary ability, a man beloved and a friend trusted, he, too, gave the spiritual and intellectual life of Oregon an enduring impress for good.

And we cannot close these representative sketches of men given to Oregon by our missionary work without mentioning another name that represents in our history a personality which, perhaps as much as any of our missionary era, left its mark upon that era and upon the future of this portion of our national life. The place filled by James H. Wilbur was as exceptional as his personality was unique. He grappled his friends to himself with hooks of steel softened and tempered with tears. In his purposes he was unrelenting. His will was as imperious as Cæsar's, while his heart was as tender as a woman's. Some man like him must needs have lived in his day in Oregon to make the full-orbed manhood of our ministry and its vigor and conservatism and success incomparable and complete. The quarter of a century of his life devoted to the elevation of the Yakima Indian nation gave him a national reputation and influence that made him a counselor of presidents and cabinets on questions which related to the welfare of the Indian tribes. Like Lee and Waller and Hines, his physical presence was imposing and princely. As Napier said of Ridge, writing from the field on which he fell, "No men fell on the field that day with more glory than he; yet many fell, and there was much glory."

But time and space would fail us to speak of those of whom these were but representatives. Could such men have lived their long years and poured the fire and culture of their eloquence, the purity and consecration of their Christian service, into the hearts and homes, over the assemblies and congregations, of the Oregon that was, without having imparted the best and truest impulse to the Oregon that now is and that which is yet to be? Were we to take by the hand and lead into the presence of our audience of readers the women who stood by their side and gave these heroes the benediction of their love and confidence both at home and abroad, in the study and in the pulpit, the statement would not seem strange that no equal number of women of any profession ever left so strong and benign an influence on the life of Oregon as those given the State by the selection and appointment of our missionary board from 1834 to 1853.

The writer's thoughts move on, but his pen must cease to record them. He has stood, while writing this paper, in the light of the memory of men whom his heart almost apotheosizes. How they touched, moved, and melted us, and how their work as the years roll on enlarges to our comprehension! Greater opportunity has not been given to mortals since the foot of the Pilgrim stepped on Plymouth Rock. No better men for the opportunity did God ever find among his chosen than were those who laid the foundations of what is to be the greatest, grandest, central State of the ultimate West, in the Americanization of Oregon and the stamp and mold they put on its early social and intellectual life.

H. K. Hines,

Art. VII.—THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK.

The supply of antiquities still hidden away in the pyramids, temples, and tombs and covered by the soil of Egypt seems to be literally inexhaustible. It is a land of wonders and a land of startling surprises. Though discoveries in this land of archæological marvels have been many and important, that of the Tel el-Amarna tablets will doubtless remain one of the great achievements of the century. The proceedings of learned societies, special monographs by eminent Orientalists and Egyptologists, and periodicals devoted to archæological subjects have furnished studies, criticisms, and translations which have earned for their authors the gratitude of the general student. Professor Sayce presents translations which have been published in the new series of the Records of the Past. His admirable introductions are rich in facts and suggestions. The condition of Palestine one hundred years before the Israelitish conquest is shown us in an interesting light. Its numerous cities are tributary to Egypt, and their kings, governors, or princes report to the reigning Pharaoh. They furnish their contingent of soldiers, horses, and war chariots to the king's army upon his demand; and when their own territory is threatened they may appeal to Egypt for help. The king is governed by no uniform rule in his treatment of these dependencies, except to insure their loyalty and maintain their good will by severity or generosity, each case being judged on its own merits. Egyptian governors are appointed to certain cities, while in other cities native princes retain their positions and titles and exercise limited powers. The latter must pay tribute regularly, admit an Egyptian garrison at the pleasure of the great king, and receive the visits of a commissioner who makes an investigation of their political condition and communicates the results to the Pharaoh. Sometimes an Egyptian governor sits by the side of the native prince, but in such case the power of the latter is doubtless nominal. When a native prince is left in power the dependent territory is still called "the country of the king," and an Egyptian governor is appointed over each of its important towns. In this manner the power of the most favored is greatly reduced. The Egyptian soldiers in Palestine consist of several classes. The "soldiers of the palace" are a sort of bodyguard of the prince, and are the most highly honored. The "soldiers of the garrison" are the most numerous, and hold responsible positions. It is possible that the "soldiers of the kingdom" are hired foreign mercenaries, and "the plunderers"—the modern Bedouins are their descendants, at least in character—seem to be in the pay of the Egyptian government. We may express the hope that the last were seldom employed.

The Tel el-Amarna tablets were written in the time of Amenophis III and his son Amenophis IV, or Khuenaten, "the heretic king." They consist, for the most part, of dispatches sent from the governors in Palestine and Syria to the Pharaoh. Several of these letters speak of some common danger which threatens the integrity of the empire. The subject States hold themselves in readiness to resist the foe. The Hittites and their allies are already pressing upon the empire from the north. The peoples of Naharaim and Babylonia will not leave them in peace. Later letters show a disturbed condition of the country which can only exist when the central authority has become weak and is ready to fall. Not only are enemies invading the land, but princes are fighting among themselves. There are criminations and counter-criminations and professions of loyalty. Appeals to Egypt multiply and become pitiable. Evidently the Pharaoh has more than he can do to attend to the religious revolt at home, which finally overthrows his dynasty and inaugurates anew the old régime. He must leave Palestine to its fate.

There is one governor who occupies a position quite peculiar and independent. He is the governor of Jerusalem, and his name is Ebed-tob. He is a priest-king, and has been designated to his position by the oracle of the god of the city. This divine appointment to his office evidently gives him great satisfaction, and he refers to the exceptional fact again and again. "Behold, neither my father nor my mother has exalted me in this place; the prophecy of the mighty king has caused me to enter the house of my father." "Behold, this country of the city of Jerusalem neither my father nor my mother has given to me; it was an oracle that gave it to me, even to me." The letter shows that "the mighty king" is the god of Jerusalem.

The king of Egypt is called "the great king," sarru rabu, but not "the mighty king," sarru dannu. The prophet of Jerusalem in the days of Ebed-tob was the spiritual predecessor of the Jewish prophets of later date, in bringing foreign nations within the range of his vision. We have the very words of one of his prophetic utterances: "While there is a ship in the midst of the sea"—this is the oracle of the mighty king—"the conquests shall continue of the country of Nakhrima and the country of Babylonia," or Kasim, as Babylonia is now under a Kassite dynasty. The translation of Zimmern gives a different reading: "The arm of the mighty king shall conquer the countries of Naharaim and Babylonia." Both translations, however, witness to the historic character of the campaign of Chedorlaomer and the oppression of Chushan-rishathaim (Gen. xiv; Judg. iii, 8–10).

The historicity of that passage of Manetho is defended wherein he relates that when the Hyksos were expelled from Egypt they built or fortified Jerusalem, that they might successfully defend themselves against the attacks from the Assyrians—the Babylonians being known as Assyrians in the time of the historian.

Fortunately the name of the god of Jerusalem has not been lost. In one of his reports Ebed-tob declares that the country of the king has gone over to the Khabiri, or Confederates, and continues: "And now at this moment the city of the mountain of Jerusalem, the city of the temple of the god Uras whose name is 'Salim, the city of the king, is separated from the locality of the men of the city of Keilah." As the priest of 'Salim, Ebed-tob was more than a mere political governor, and makes such a claim. He calls himself, in our letter, "the ally of the king." He professes, nevertheless, perfect loyalty, defends himself against unjust accusations, and does not fail to declare, in humility, "I at the feet of the king my lord seven times seven prostrate myself." His government ranks high among the principalities of Palestine. He is a priest-king, and more a priest than a king. He is priest of 'Salim, and not king of Jerusalem. In Assyria priests of the god Assur preceded kings of the city Assur. The same may be said of the kingdom of Saba in southern Arabia. The government is a theocracy, like that of Israel before the establishment of the monarchy.

We have already learned that Jerusalem was threatened by the Khabiri, or Confederates, and it would seem that Elimelech was at that time their king. The Khabiri are "Hebronites," and Hebron, "the Confederacy," was in their possession and served as their rallying point. Previous to this occupancy the name of the city was Kirjath-arba. This confederacy was formed of Hittites and Amorites. Ebed-tob repeatedly appeals to the Pharaoh for help. "The king has established his name in the country of Jerusalem forever, and he cannot forsake the districts of the city of Jerusalem." "The Confederates have wasted all the countries of the king. If auxiliaries come this year the countries of the king the lord will be preserved; but if no auxiliaries come the countries of the king my lord are destroyed." These appeals would seem to have been in vain. Khuenaten—Amenophis IV—was expelled from his throne, met a sudden death, and was buried in haste. This becomes evident from a careful study of his recently discovered tomb. Before his burial was complete enemies broke into the tomb, took the mummy from the sarcophagus and tore its wrappings into shreds, destroyed the sarcophagus, and effaced the name and image of his god from the walls of the chamber of the dead. The Egyptian troops are withdrawn from Palestine, and the Confederates conquer Jerusalem. When the Israelites enter Canaan, Jerusalem has become Jebus and is held by the Jebusites, a powerful and warlike tribe of Amorites, and its citadel remained in their power till the reign of David. We have in this fragment of history an explanation of a passage in the prophecy of Ezekiel: "Thus said the Lord God unto Jerusalem; Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite" (Ezek. xvi, 3, 45). The confederacy of Hebron is the same in character as that of which Abraham the Hebrew was the overlord (Gen. xiv, 13). These confederacies were natural and influential and doubtless frequent in early Palestinian history.

We return to a further consideration of the god 'Salim. His character is apparently that of a sun-god, since he is connected with the Babylonian sun-god Uras, the god of Nipur. The etymology of Jerusalem is given in the tablets Uru-salim. Uru means "city," and therefore Jerusalem is "the city of the god 'Salim" and the seat of his special worship. 'Salim—the word is very familiar under the form of the Hebrew shalôm, "peace"—is "the god of peace." Here, then, is a most sacred sanctuary, where all feuds are laid aside and all peoples can meet in unity under the protection of "the god of peace." It is appropriate that the priest of 'Salim be raised to higher honors than the ordinary governors of provinces. The reign of Solomon, "the peaceful king," was a reign of peace. Sallimmanu, "the god of peace," was especially honored in Assyria, and the name is found as an element in the names of many ancient kings. It would seem that he bore the character of a fish-god, which fact would point to Lower Babylonia as the original seat of his worship and a possible connection with Ea, the god of culture, represented in human form, but partially inclosed in the body or skin of a fish which hangs down his back and surmounts him with its head. In an inscription we read: "Sallimmanu, the fish, the god of the city of Temen-Sallim, 'the foundation of peace.'" In the time of Shalmaneser II—the name may be translated "O 'Salim, help!"—there was a royal scribe at Sadikan, the modern Arban, who bore the cumbrous name Sallimmanu-nunu-sar-ilani, "Sallimmanu, the fish, is king of the gods." There are other references to this god in Assyria, but we come nearer to the scene of our present studies and note that, in the time of Tiglath-Pileser III, Salamanu was the name of the Moabite king.

Ebed-tob, "servant of Tob," represents a series of names of which the Bible furnishes many examples. In the Tel el Amarna tablets we meet with Ebed-Ashera, "servant of Ashera." The word Ebed as an element of proper names is too frequent in the Bible to require especial mention. With Ebed-tob we may compare Tab-rimon of 1 Kings xv, 18, and Tabeal of Isa. vii, 6.

We now take up the name Melchizedek. Its last element is Sydyk, the name of an old Phœnician god who, in connection with seven or eight Khabiri, his sons, is the center of a vast mysterious, and extensive mythology. Ebed-tob employs the word tsaduk, "just," in his correspondence, but it is not a native Assyrian word. The only other king of Jerusalem whose name has been preserved—and he also stood at the head of a confederacy of cities—is Adonizedek, who, with other allied kings, was captured and slain by Joshua. We may translate the names of the two kings of Jerusalem, "Sydyk is my king," and "Sydyk is my lord." We may be justified in the suggestion that the god of Jerusalem may have been worshiped under the names Zedek, "the righteous one," or "righteousness," and Tob, "the good one," or "goodness," if the latter element have the meaning usually assigned. The word Zedek may be purely attributive, and in such case the name of the two kings may be translated, "My king is righteous," or "He is the king of righteousness," and "My lord is righteous," or "He is the lord of righteousness." There are other biblical names which contain the same element. The word occurs in Assyro-Babylonian names, but has evidently been borrowed. In The Assyrian Chronicle we have the record, "Tsidqi-ilu of the country of Tuskhan, at home." The date is B. C. 764. The name may be translated: "Sydyk is my god," "The god of righteousness," or "My god is righteous." We also meet with a Babylonian king who bears the name Ammi-zadugga, which, if zadugga be the name of a god, we may translate, "Sydyk is my trusted friend;" or, perhaps better, with Professor Sayce we may take the first element in the compound as the name of a god and translate, "Ammi is just." In one of the Minæan inscriptions discovered by Halévy in the south of Arabia mention is made of one 'Ammi-tsadiqa, governor of the district of Ashur and also of the fortress of Zar on the Egyptian frontier. Professor Hommel assigns this inscription to a very early epoch, probably that of the Hyksos domination in Egypt. His appointment was made by the Minæan king Abi-yada'. In another Minæan inscription is found a third variant of the same name, 'Ammi-tsaduq. There is also the name of a King Waqah-il-tsaduq.

The name of Melchizedek is not an invention, but is properly formed of known elements and is placed in an appropriate setting. It is Semitic, but not Assyrian, and may be translated like other Semitic names and yields a similar meaning. Melchizedek is a worshiper of the "most high God," or "God most high"—El-Elion—which god may with probability be identified with 'Salim, "the god of peace." This is the first place in which the title "most high" occurs in the Bible. It is interesting to remark that Baalam, another alien from the family of Abraham, uses the same title. Sanchoniathon, the Phœnician historian, mentions Elion as the name of a Phœnician deity. It has been assumed that Abraham recognized Melchizedek as a worshiper of the true God, but the evidence does not necessitate such a conclusion, except in the same sense in which Paul recognized the Athenians as worshipers of the true God. Melchizedek, "the priest of the most high god," has blessed Abraham and blessed "the most high god" who has delivered his enemies into his hands, and has assumed that this god, whom he describes as "the possessor of heaven and earth," is the God whom Abraham worships. The patriarch does not dispute this view, but when the first opportunity is presented declares that Jehovah is "the most high God." "I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth"—Jehovah El-Elion, "Jehovah, God most high." The force, solemnity, and majesty of the declaration are characteristic of this grandest type of patriarchal gentleman. Jehovah is not a tribal god, but the God of all the families of the earth.

There is peculiar appropriateness in the part which Melchizedek plays in the account of the campaign of Abraham against Chedorlaomer. When the enemy had been defeated and driven from the land, and the conqueror was returning from his brilliant exploit, and the whole country was again at rest and in the full enjoyment of an honorable peace, then it was that the priest of 'Salim, "the god of peace," came forth to meet Abraham and to pronounce upon him his blessing. The bread and wine were for his refreshment after his long and rapid marches, and partly also, possibly, to be used as offerings to the god of peace to whom his success was due. We may understand, furthermore, why Abraham gave tithes of all his spoil. He was within the territorial domain of Jerusalem, and the tithes were due to Melchizedek as the ruling prince, due by virtue of both his kingly and his priestly character. He could demand them as his right, and the laws of war required their payment.

Professor Sayce may be right in attaching especial significance to the use of "my gods" in addressing the king of Egypt. Though "my god" is the more usual expression and shows a practical knowledge of the singular form, the occurrence of "my gods" is too frequent to be accounted for as an individual peculiarity or extravagance, or yet a mistake on the part of those scribes who were imperfectly acquainted with the Assyrian language. It is not an Egyptian form of expression, but belongs to the language of Canaan. Its connection may be seen in sentences like the following: "I, Su-yardata thy servant, the dust of thy feet, at the feet of the king my lord, my gods, my sun-god, seven times seven prostrate myself." "I, Malchiel thy servant, the dust of thy feet, at the feet of the king my lord, my gods, my sun-god, seven times seven prostrate myself. Word has been sent by the king my lord, my gods, my sun-god, to me. Now is health enjoyed by the king my lord, the sun-god who rises from heaven; and verily knows the king my lord, my gods, my sun-god, that this is the place of the king my lord which he has intrusted to me." Most elaborate is the introduction of the letter of the governor of Sidon: "To the king my lord, my gods, my sun-god, my king, my lord, speak thus: I, Zimriddi, the governor of the city of Sidon, at the feet of my lord, my gods, my king, who is my lord, at the feet of my lord, my gods, my sun-god, my king, my lord, seven times seven prostrate myself." The king of Egypt was not only "the son of the sun," but also the sun-god himself, being completely identified with this divinity; but no Egyptian would address him as "my gods." We do not find this expression in the letters of Ebed-tob, but it is used by the princess Su-yardata and Malchiel and others whose territories are contiguous to his own. It would make the god to whom it is applied absolutely supreme, containing within his own nature and being all attributes and essences of all gods. Familiarity with this usage on the part of the Canaanites may have been preparatory to the appreciation of the Hebrew plural form Elohim, the god who contains within his own nature and being all possible divine attributes and essences. This Semitism, which has called forth so much learned discussion, philological, theological, and rhetorical, certainly antedates the writings of Moses by nearly a century.

We should guard against finding in the monuments confirmations of the Bible where they are questionable or do not exist at all. We recognize the fact that archæological research has not only settled many questions concerning biblical subjects, but has also raised not a few which still await future discoveries for their full elucidation. We may, however, call attention to a remarkable coincidence. The Assyrian Sar 'Salim, "king of Salem," or "priest of 'Salim," the god of peace, is letter for letter identical with the title which Isa. ix, 6, gives prophetically to the Messiah—Sar Shalóm, "Prince of Peace."

The information which the Old Testament affords concerning Melchizedek is soon exhausted. The author of Genesis gives his name and office, the seat of his authority, and a single incident in his life. He meets Abraham with bread and wine, blesses him, and receives from him the tithes of the spoil. There is but a single reference elsewhere. One of the Psalms—cx, 4—contains, as from the Lord, the prophecy, "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." Paul interprets the passage as pointing to the priesthood of Christ. It is plain, however, that the use which Paul makes of the character and office of Melchizedek is not justified by the Old Testament fragment of his history, if taken alone. He could hardly have been taken as a type of Christ, in illustrating the divine origin and unchangeableness of his priesthood. Much less could Paul have described him as "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God." Paul must have had access to other sources of information. The only other source of information known even up to the present day is the correspondence preserved in the Tel el-Amarna tablets; but Paul knew as little of these tablets as of the hieroglyphic writings of Uxmal and Palenque. Even had these tablets been known to Paul, he would not, in all probability, have written as he did.

Ebed-tob, the successor of Melchizedek, was not elected to his office by the people, nor by any college of nobles or ecclesiastics; he came not to his position of influence and authority by virtue of belonging to any priestly tribe or family; he was not appointed by any king or high official; he did not usurp the priesthood; he was designated to his office by the oracle of 'Salim, "the god of peace." Melchizedek, like Ebed-tob, was probably the overlord of a confederacy of cities or provinces. He was priest of the same god, appointed to his office by the same divine oracle, and served at the same sanctuary which was established on Mount Moriah. The description of him which Paul presents is not that of the historian. It is such as account as would be given by an author whose mind has been divinely quickened to recognize spiritual connections and interpret prophetic types, and whose knowledge of the character whose portrait he paints is exact but general, rather than minute and circumstantial. His portrait is true to the facts revealed in the correspondence of the tablets, and these facts explain the whole "conundrum" of Melchizedek. Paul could not have written from the Old Testament history, and he could not have written from information such as the tablets afford, unless this were supplemented from other sources. Whence did Paul derive his knowledge of Melchizedek?

We may now name several priests belonging to "the order of Melchizedek." When Jerusalem appears on the page of history it is already a holy city, the city of 'Salim. Melchizedek is its priest-king, its government being a theocracy. He receives tithes and pronounces his priestly blessing. 'Salim, "the god of peace," is called "the most high god," and is said to be the "possessor of heaven and earth." It is instructive to note that here is the first occurrence of the word "priest" in the Bible, and that the incumbent of the office is alien to the family of Abraham. As we learn from the correspondence of his successor, this priest is selected and consecrated to the priesthood by the oracle of his god, who has his sanctuary on Mount Moriah. Abraham does not directly deny that 'Salim is the true God, but does declare that Jehovah is "God most high." We are not told that Melchizedek offers sacrifices, but we may assume that this is the case.

We are able to supplement this account. About thirty years after the campaign against Chedorlaomer, Abraham visits the old sanctuary on Mount Moriah for the supreme trial of his faith. While at Beer-sheba, Abraham planted a "grove," or tamarisk tree, and called on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God—Jehovah El-Olam, "Jehovah, God of Eternity." Perhaps El-Olam was the name of a local divinity, or a local name for the Supreme Being, like El-Elion. "The God," that is, "this same God," commanded the patriarch to offer his son Isaac as a burnt offering in "the land of Moriah." When he is about to complete the sacrifice by slaying his son upon the altar which he has erected "the Angel of Jehovah," who can be none other than he whom Isaiah calls "the Prince of Peace," arrests his hand. We may be permitted to hazard the suggestion that Abraham just at this time might have been in danger of adopting the belief of the surrounding heathen tribes and nations, that a human sacrifice, especially the sacrifice of an only son, was peculiarly meritorious and acceptable to God, and that the lesson taught on Mount Moriah might have saved the Abrahamic Church at a most critical period in the very beginning of its history. When Abraham gave to God not only his dearest possession, but all his possessions and himself, any victim suitable and perfect in itself would sufficiently represent this sacrifice. The word Moriah means "the vision of Jehovah," or, "the manifestation of Jehovah." Abraham now christens it with a name of similar meaning, Jehovah-jireh, "Jehovah will see," or, "Jehovah will provide." All local gods, whether 'Salim or El-Elion or El-Olam, in so far as they are not names of the Supreme Being, must yield to Jehovah, to whom alone worship is to be accorded, even in the very presence of the sanctuary of "the god of peace."

The next mention of the holy city is found in the correspondence of Ebed-tob, and the date is about a hundred years before the Exodus. He is priest of the god 'Salim, who is worshiped on "the mountain of Jerusalem." We have discussed this fragment of history at some length, and need only refer to the subject in this connection.

At the time of the conquest of Palestine by Joshua, Adonizedek was king of Jerusalem and overlord of an Amorite confederacy consisting of the five cities, Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon. We are not informed as to his priestly functions, but may infer from the name that he was a successor of Ebed-tob. It is probable that, upon the conquest of Jerusalem by the Amorites and Hittites, Adonizedek was confirmed in his office (Josh. x, 1–5).

Another period of three or four hundred years, and we reach the age of David. Because of the sin of David a destroying angel was sent "unto Jerusalem to destroy it." "And the angel of the Lord stood by the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. And David lifted up his eyes, and saw the angel of the Lord stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem." And the Lord repented of the evil, and the city was spared, but the pestilence had already swept away seventy thousand men of Israel. The angel of Jehovah commanded David to build "an altar unto the Lord in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite." The threshing floor was purchased of Ornan the Jebusite, and the full price was paid. David, like his great ancestor Abraham, did not use the strange altar of the ancient sanctuary, if indeed this still remained, but erected a new altar, and offered sacrifices thereon unto the Lord. So the hand of the destroying angel was stayed. "At that time when David saw that the Lord had answered him in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there." This holy place was on Mount Moriah, and here Solomon afterward built "the house of the Lord" (2 Sam. xxiv, 10–25; 1 Chron. xxi, 9–30; xxvii, 24; 2 Chron. iii, 1).

As Melchizedek and Ebed-tob were designated to their office by the oracle of the god 'Salim, in like manner David and Solomon were appointed to the throne by the word of the God of Israel, and performed also high priestly functions.

The last member of the order of Melchizedek is Christ, who has entered upon his everlasting priesthood. He belongs not to the tribe of Levi, but to the tribe of Judah. He is the "Sent of God." He is the "Prince of Peace," whose advent is announced as the promise and prophecy of "peace." His last will and testament declares to his sorrowing disciples, "My peace I give unto you." Through conquest he will conduct to perfect, uninterrupted, and everlasting peace. He is "a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek."

Again we inquire, Whence did the apostle derive that information which enabled him to describe so accurately that "king of Salem" to whom Abraham gave tithes?

Art. VIII.—THE SEMICENTENNIAL OF THE SCOTCH FREE CHURCH AND OF ITS MEMORABLE DISRUPTION CONTROVERSY.

On the 18th of May, 1893, the day when the next Free Church Assembly meets, will occur the fiftieth anniversary of the famous Disruption of May 18, 1843, the date of the birth or emergence of the Free from the Established Church of Scotland. That was a very remarkable event, one of the most interesting and important in the history of British Protestantism. No wonder that the Free Church proposes to commemorate it with a jubilee which shall duly honor the truly notable epoch. Meanwhile, all intelligent members of other evangelical communions will be pleased, we feel assured, to be put in possession of the material facts in this case.

Owing to the fact that the exact relations of the Scottish Kirk to the State have never been accurately or positively defined they cannot be very definitely understood. It is well known, however, that one of the most important privileges to which the State, in return for the maintenance of the clergy of an establishment, lays claim is the right of what is called patronage; that is, the right of conferring upon those nobles who, as the owners of the estates, are charged with the payment of the salaries of the pastors, the unrestricted right of nominating or "presenting" these pastors to the "livings." Now, however great may be the advantages resulting from a union of the Church and State upon such conditions, it is evident at the outset that these advantages must be far more than counterbalanced by the fact that such a license necessarily leaves the right of choosing pastors—the most sacredly guarded right of all—liable to be committed to men of every degree of imbecility, ignorance, irreligion, and immorality, and hence subjects the people to the dread, not to say fatal, contingency of being conveyed by thousands over to the supervision of some patronage-courting clergyman who knows little about and cares less for the religion he professes to teach. The Scotch Kirk, perceiving early and but too well what evils must flow from such an unrestricted patronage, had taken care not to be defrauded altogether of her right of free self-government, by reserving the power, in case of dissatisfaction, to veto the nomination of the patron. This privilege of rejecting the patron's nominee remained for ages unquestioned. At the close of the last century, however, resulting in a great measure, it is to be presumed, from the low state of religion among them at that time, a strong antipathy on the part of a large proportion of the ministry of the Kirk began to be publicly expressed for that popular taste, or choice, which had hitherto stood guard over the liberties of the Church, and which, whenever and wherever it is allowed to express itself, gives its testimony so unequivocally in favor of the purity and warmth by which a truly evangelical ministry is ever distinguished. At length, indeed, it was decided by the highest judicatory in the Church, the General Assembly, that the concurrence of the people should no longer be regarded as an indispensable element in the formation of the pastoral tie, but that, on the other hand, the presentation of the patron alone, with entire disregard for any opposition on the part of the people, however prevalent or strong, should have effect; superseding thus, and very ruthlessly, a usage authorized and held as sacred by all the standards of the Church, from the Reformation down. Alarmed by this grossly unjust and unwarrantable assumption of power on the part of their ecclesiastical authorities, those in the Church, both ministers and people, who still remained loyal to her true interests and longed to see introduced the principles and practices of an earlier and purer period, engaged at once in active preparations for making a determined and obstinate resistance to this encroachment upon their liberties, which would be fatal unless arrested, and for eventually throwing off altogether this yoke of patronage, which became every day more intolerably galling as its chains daily became more firmly riveted. As the result of this popular reaction the liberal party in the Church was in due time reinforced by a class of men whose energy, talents, and piety were successful in restoring to the evangelical party the balance of power in the General Assembly. Hardly, however, had this victory been achieved when another form of opposition was developed, which was even more formidable than that which had just been so successfully overcome.

Guided by the precedent already established by the General Assembly, the civil courts determined henceforth to maintain at all hazards the unrestricted right of patronage. The evangelical party began now to assume a more definite shape and to give its energy a still more specific direction. The conservative wing of it, at the head of which was Dr. Thomas Chalmers, strenuously opposed the abolition of patronage altogether, yet demanded that it should be so limited, regulated, or restrained that the conscientious convictions and religious susceptibilities of Christian congregations should never more be violated; that, in a word, an effectual provision be made for all the future against the unfeeling outrages which, in the exercise of a reckless, high-handed patronage reigning uncontrolled, had so often been perpetrated. The radical wing took for its first note of assault that the compulsory support of religious institutions is inconsistent with the nature of religion, the spirit of the Gospel, the express appointment of Jesus Christ, and the rights of man, its tendencies as exhibited in its effects being to secularize religion, to promote hypocrisy, perpetuate error, produce infidelity, destroy the unity and purity of the Church, and to disturb the peace and order of civil society.

Such was the attitude of the evangelical party when the famous Auchterarder case came up, a case which, from the fact that it was generally understood to involve the constitutionality or legality of the usage of rejecting the patron's nominee, awakened a wide and very profound interest. A presentation of one Mr. Young was issued by the Earl of Kinnoull to the vacant parish of Auchterarder. After the former had duly preached on trial it was decided, on the part of the congregation, by a vote of six to one, that the candidate was unacceptable. Mr. Young appealed. Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly, however, in turn, sustained the decision of the congregation. Appealing then from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts, the redoubtable nominee brought an action against the Presbytery before the supreme civil court, the Court of Session. Here, on the 18th of May, 1838, it was decided that the rejection of Mr. Young by the various church tribunals was illegal and in violation of duty. In nearly one year from that date the Auchterarder case was heard before the House of Lords. After the delivery of Lord Brougham's opinion confirming the decision of the Court of Session the appeal was finally dismissed.

The principle which, in this important finding of the House of Lords, seemed now to be finally and decisively defined and settled was that, whereas a voluntary Church may regulate and decide in reference to its own officers and be separate from and in no wise subject to civil authority, a Church preferring to participate in the advantages of an establishment, enjoying all the immunities and privileges growing out of a connection with the State, must not claim exemption from the obligations which that relation implies, among which is that of yielding implicit obedience to certain decisions of the civil courts. Preferring to dissolve at once their connection with the State rather than make the required concession to her demands—so utterly and so manifestly repugnant to the whole spirit and letter of the ancient constitution of the Church—without a murmur, as also without debate, the entire nonintrusion or Free Church party resolved to withdraw from the Establishment. On the 18th of May, 1843, while the General Assembly was sitting in Edinburgh, more than four hundred ministers solemnly arose, withdrew, repaired to a hall of their own, and in four days had formally and legally completed the disruption and organized and established the Free Church of Scotland.

It may be questioned whether since the days of the apostles an event involving more of moral sublimity has ever occurred. Let it be remembered that in taking the step above described these four hundred and seventy-four clergymen, and all for Christ's sake, voluntarily renounced the emoluments and preferments of a wealthy Establishment, and thereby accordingly subjected themselves to all the inconveniences, privations, hardships, poverty, and persecutions which almost invariably pursue a dissenting body. They returned to their various fields of labor with not one single church edifice or parsonage in all the land which they could properly call their own—a scene which, it is said, drew tears from even Lord Jeffrey, extorting from him the confession that no country but Scotland could have exhibited a spectacle so morally sublime, and all for the keeping of a good conscience.

Dr. Hanna, in his Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers, speaking of the hardships incurred by many of these dissenting ministers and their devoted congregations, eloquently writes:

> Many ministers were driven from the loveliest homes, compelled to study in garrets, and to sleep frequently with nothing between them and the open heavens but the cold slate. The privation and exposure were often too much for them, and they sunk to their graves martyrs for those great principles for which they had abandoned their earthly all. . . . Here and there the hand of tyranny was stretched out; and from the church and churchyard, from the bare hillside, the grove and public highways, on all of which they sought to assemble and to worship God, ministers and people were driven, till they took their station within high-water mark on the lone seabeach, their feet upon the damp and tangled seaweed, the roll of the breakers, whose spray the breeze drove over them, keeping time to their solemn psalmody.

Professor W. Garden Blaikie, D.D., having himself been one of that heroic band that fifty years ago thus surrendered everything for the truth's sake with only the very darkest prospects for the future, writing in a late number of the New York Observer concerning this same most soul-stirring event, says:

You can hardly comprehend a state of things where, the whole land being in the hands of a few aristocratic owners, it was often impossible to get a site for church or manse, and where, in bleakest winter, congregations had to worship on the public road or on the hillside, and ministers were glad of a single room in a rough cottage, so that they might live among their people. Many a minister could look for nothing but poverty, privation, and persecution.

But what, it may be asked, is the status of this Free Church to-day? Dr. Blaikie—who, by the way, is one of the thirty-four surviving ministers of the four hundred and seventy-four that a half century ago severed their connection with the State, Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, being another—Dr. Blaikie writes:

That fifty years would see our Church doubled and its ministers enjoying a provision not very much less than that which they left, with a full equipment of churches, manses, colleges, normal schools, libraries, bursaries, and what not; our income for foreign missions increased tenfold; our colonies recruited, and many stations provided on the continent of Europe; not a little done at home to reclaim the lapsed and provide for increasing population, was more than any one dreamed of in his most sanguine hours. The promise of compensation for sacrifices incurred for the sake of Christ has been so amply fulfilled that some imagine there could have been little sacrifice in the case. But this is unfair; so far as the eye of sense could guide us the leap at the disruption was a leap in the dark, into poverty, difficulty, and misery; but then, as ever, faith had its reward, and the more prosperous circumstances in which we now are simply afford fresh proof of God's faithfulness to them that trust him, and are evidence that now, as much as in the days of Abraham, his memorial is Jehovah-jireh—"the Lord will provide."

The whole Church of God on earth cannot but feel most fervently thankful for such a magnificent example of self-sacrifice and disinterested toil on the part of this grand Church, congratulate it on its truly monumental success, and wish for it a most happy time in connection with its forthcoming jubilee. Meanwhile, not a few of the most illustrious names that have ever graced the annals of the Christian pulpit or adorned the records of religious authorship were identified with the movement. Easily chief among these is Dr. Chalmers, the orator of the cause. Next comes Dr. Robert Smith Candlish, who may be characterized as the statesman of the movement. Then we have the gifted, incomparable Guthrie, who, more than any other man, by tongue and pen, raised funds for building manses for the destitute Free Church ministers. And who has not read the masterly sermons of Dr. Thomas Guthrie? Dr. Norman McLeod, one of the brightest lights of the Scottish pulpit, was one of the representative men of the Free Church. But the popular favorite, as well as the pamphleteer and newspaper writer of this enterprise, was that marvelous stonecutter and self-made geologist, Hugh Miller. The tractate of the latter, addressed to Lord Brougham, reviewing the argument of the great speech in which that eminent statesman supported the finding of the House of Lords, was the means of introducing this layman and commoner to the people of Scotland and designating him as one eminently calculated to act a conspicuous part in the coming struggle. It is said that, at the time of the triumphant exodus of the Free Church, already described, when her ministers and members in the full flush of victory assembled in Tanfield Hall, Canonmills, none of her defenders in the vast and animated throng, among whom Chalmers and Candlish stood conspicuous, elicited plaudits longer or louder than did Hugh Miller when seen lifting his stalwart and noble head among the people.

EDITORIAL NOTES AND DISCUSSIONS.

OPINION.

The supernatural is continually inviting. As a theme of meditation it occupies perhaps the most constant place in intellectual processes; in its extent of influence the wide race dreams of its felicities and is ravished with its entrancing visions; as a tenet of formal theology its statement is indispensable to a perfect code of religious doctrine. On which latter point Max Müller has well declared that without a belief in immortality "religion surely is like an arch resting on one pillar, like a bridge ending in an abyss"—a declaration which needs no modification save to the extent of saying that the arch and the bridge under such circumstances would be of less stability than is implied. But there can be no controversy as to the universality of man's belief in the supernatural. The nations which hold the truth of the Christian system are not peculiar in this respect. The story is too familiar to the scholar to necessitate particular review. Alike in the sacred books of the Hindoos, among the early Egyptians and Polynesians, in the religious system of the Persians, and in the practical belief of the Chinese, as well as among the Hebrews and their successors—the Christian Church—has immortality been the hope of men. No fact in human history is more clear than the attitude of the nations upon this point of faith. Ancient or modern, barbaric or educated, pagan or Christian, they have united in the confident anticipation of a hereafter. However at variance in their religious tenets, as exponents of the different religious systems of the earth, they have been essentially a unit in such assumptions as the existence of a superior deity, the survival of the soul, and a place of blessedness for the departed. No chapter in comparative religion is more fascinating than that containing the blissful dream of a future world which has buoyed the souls of the succeeding nations of the globe. All literature is crowded with these fancies, hopes, and aspirations of men for immortality. Nor is belief in the supersensible degrading. As a moving factor in the elevation of human life no confidence of the soul is more influential than faith in immortality. There is no inspiring quality in skepticism. A negation has never turned upside down the established faiths of the world. It is a poor watchword for battle; it does not send the life blood bounding in enthusiasm through the veins of its disciples; nor for it are men glad to lay down their lives and die. But the thought of personal immortality has entered into the largest performances of the race. As an influencing force upon human thinking, resolve, enthusiasm, it has led men's souls whithersoever it would. Always has it roused to extreme zeal, supported men in the dungeon and at the stake, made the lone missionary to put to thousand to flight, given a rainbow hue to the falling tears of sorrow, and lit the bed of death with glory. If the doctrine of immortality be a mistake, as some would have us think, we are confronted with the inexplicable fact of the ennobling of the race through a madman's dream. If it be true—as the consensus of human judgment declares it to be—it should shape every thought and action with its molding power.

We are favored or afflicted with several visitations from the Orient, more or less religious. An American consul to a Mohammedan country, who was not provided with any religion to speak of, becoming vaguely aware that it is a respectable thing for a man to have a religion of some kind, has decided that Mohammedanism is good enough for him, and brings a new convert's enthusiasm home with him, yearning to ensnare us all in the meshes of the Mohammedan web and substitute in the home of Western civilization the faith of the crescent for that of the cross. His step-ladder is not long enough to enable him to reach up and set back the hands on the dial of human progress. He is but a momentary amusement and a target for newspapers on the lookout for a chance to shoot folly as it flies, having for their motto, "What fools we mortals be!" Theosophy, too, "the Wisdom Religion," visits us from afar from time to time in the persons of such missionaries as Madame Blavatsky, Colonel Olcutt, Mrs. Anne Besant. It also hails from the dreamy Orient and comes to convert the Occident. With the mild delirium of hasheesh swimming in its eyes it feebly stretches out its soft and inefficient hands to direct and push on the intense interests and urgent affairs of this practical land. It attempts to bring reverie to bear upon action and achievement. It produces a weak literature, attempts limited philanthropies, establishes a few sewing schools, soup kitchens, homes for children, crèches, Sunday schools, clubs for working men and women, all on a slim foundation and with prospects of duration as precarious as morning dew. It calls conventions, holds talk-exhibitions, and is to have, we are told, two whole days in the Parliament of Religions at the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago for expounding its profundities. It advertises its expectation of universal victory which is to be won by "the force of the few, the spiritual force of quality, and not by the brute force of numbers." Theosophy, as it calls itself, were unworthy of notice in these pages but for the fact that it serves as well as some more pretentious and somewhat intellectually respectable systems to suggest certain facts long and widely observed. Flimsy as it is, it illustrates and typifies the character and value of every attempt to do without a creed. It roams at large in a region without survey or boundaries. Its discourses are geography without maps or outlines, geometry without figures or propositions. It pretends to believe something while pledging itself to refrain from distinctly saying what. The moment one says "I believe," and extends the sentence further by putting an object after that transitive verb, that moment he has a creed, he has constructed a formula of faith. Theosophy to the utmost of its power abstains from doctrines, and those which it cannot avoid having are strictly esoteric. If a theoso-phist has a creed he keeps it carefully hidden. The truth he claims to possess is, on his representation, so deadly dangerous to all other faiths, and is so completely covered from sight, as to suggest to the malignant mind of a prowling enemy the possibility of having him arrested and locked up under the statute against carrying concealed weapons. "The Wisdom Religion" does not propose to give away its secrets even in the Parliament of Religions. Its participation in the religious and ethical congress at Chicago is not to involve it in any declaration of principles, not to commit the Theosophical Society or any of its members to any form of belief or any creed or dogma. What it knows about "psychic laws and phenomena" it will not publicly tell. Its exposition will not expose anything—except unintentionally its own emptiness. "Occult" appears to be theosophy's favorite word. It professes to give tuition in "occultism"—~~occult~~ arts, occult practices, occult psychical developments. The human mind under its influence drifts drowsily upon a lotus-eater's voyage, unable to tell cloud from coast, mountains from mist. As clearly, though not as fully as some stronger teachings, theosophy illustrates that so much of true or good as appears under other names is included in Christianity; that whatever of religious value is taught from other than Christian quarters is better taught by Christianity, and that whatever worthy and needful work is attempted by nonchristian hands under antichristian schemes has already been done, or can be accomplished more efficiently and perfectly by the forces marshaled under the banner of the cross. All that is valuable or admirable in such teachings is a plagiarism from Jesus Christ. Not only is it true that theosophy mumbles and mutters instead of articulating; it is also a fact that in all the good it contains we hear no resident and original voices, but only remote and confused echoes of that authoritative and informing Voice once heard from Sinai and the Mount of Olives. There is only space to add that this moonbeam named theosophy, reflected from a sun invisible to those who group themselves to bask in its cold plagiarisms, illustrates as well as some more articulate and influential thinking the fact that whatever antagonizes Christianity is close akin to paganism and naturally affiliates with heathendom, preferring to grope in the dimness of ungospeled civilizations or even in barbaric darkness. Theosophy, not content with asserting the parity of all religions, affirms the superiority of the Hindoo faiths over Christianity. It is the civilization of ancient India against the twentieth century. The future belongs not to the past.

AGAIN does the Convent of St. Catharine on Mount Sinai yield up to Christian scholarship a treasure of inestimable worth. Tischendorf's discovery in its ancient abbey of the famous Sinaitic manuscript, in the year 1859, gave to the world of letters the entire New Testament in Greek, under the date of the fourth century; the recent finding of a palimpsest, which proves to be an early copy of the Syriac version of the four gospels, deepens the conviction that St. Catharine's Convent is "an inexhaustible storehouse for early Christian literature," and must send a thrill of joy to the hearts of all New Testament scholars. The strange discovery of this manuscript has already been graphically told. That the nineteenth-century art of photography, in its resistless zeal, should have found its way into the musty abode of monks and brought therefrom the reproduction of certain pages of this ancient palimpsest is a new contribution of science to religion. So are all the forces of nature and mind—celestial and terrestrial, inanimate and alive, good and evil—to lend their aid to the triumph of Christianity in the earth. But it is with the statement that this newly found manuscript omits the last twelve verses of the gospel of St. Mark that we are most deeply concerned. The claim is by no means a new one that these verses are an interpolation dating from one of the early centuries. Remembering the existence of this theory, the revisers of the New Testament have inserted in the margin of the text the statement that "the two oldest Greek manuscripts, and some other authorities, omit from verse nine to the end." The discovery of the new Syriac version will probably give a fresh impulse to the discussion as to the genuineness of these verses; and it is a discussion whose scope we would not now anticipate. Yet we may bethink ourselves at this early stage of what are at least sentimental reasons which would call for the retention of these last verses of St. Mark. Devout and obedient souls, on recurring Easter Sabbaths, would be perplexed by the hiatus in the resurrection story found in this portion of the chapter, and would grieve over its excision. An interpolation though it could be proven, in what impressive simplicity is there recorded Christ's first appearance to Mary Magdalene, her message to the disciples, and the Lord's manifestation of himself to the Emmaus pilgrims! It is not strange that credulous faith should cling to this scripture. In its simple majesty the reader finds it hard to believe it spurious. Or what a clarion call to duty has the fifteenth verse of the chapter been, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature!" Through the earlier ages of Christian evangelism we know not how many hesitant workers have heard the voice of the great Master of souls speaking in this solemn passage. In the pioneer history of Methodism the wandering circuit-rider has fortified his soul with its authoritative mandate. And in these last years of Christian ambassadorship how many have found its edict an obstacle over which they might not pass to secular work, and, as if they heard the very voice of their risen Lord in sacred command, have renounced the world for the ministry of reconciliation! Critical scholarship may, it is true, discover reasons for the elimination of these last verses in St. Mark. But untutored faith nevertheless is rash enough to cry out for their continuance as a part of the canonical gospels, and will always find the presence of the risen Jesus in their record.

Like a foregleam of the millennial concord seems the anticipated gathering of the World's Parliament of Religions at Chicago, in September. As arranged by the Exposition Committee on Religious Congresses, unless the realization shall strongly belie the anticipation, the Parliament bids fair to become the most famous religious gathering in the world's history. Its programme, beginning with the fundamental doctrine of God and sweeping through the whole gamut of theistic, anthropological, and philanthropic themes, is worthy in its stateliness of so grand a gathering. In its personnel it promises no less to be the marked religious congress of the centuries. From the Russian, Bulgarian, and Armenian Churches delegates will probably come. Buddhist scholars, "representing both the Northern and Southern Church," are expected to be in attendance. Parsees from Bombay, Moslem scholars from India, Hindoo representatives, a Confucian scholar sent by the Chinese government, a high priest of Shintoism, and the most able representatives of the many branches of Christianity will grace the occasion with their presence and their scholarship. August the company and bewildering the range of their discussions! But the presence of Christianity in this heterogeneous gathering will particularly interest the observer. Accustomed in the pursuit of its great mission to enter many doors and to sit at the firesides of the most diverse members of the human family, it is now to meet the many religions of the earth in formal assembly and to contend for its belief before the gathered world. Yet in the presence of Buddhist, Moslem, and Parsee, Christianity may lift its head in confidence. Its doctrines are such as the reason approves and the heart commends. In its theistic teachings and its emphasis of human dignity no religious system of the world besides is its equal. Nor are the performances of Christianity altogether in discord with its theories. Holding to the value and necessity of worship, it has in all lands raised its altars whereon men may offer heart-sacrifices to the triune God. Emphasizing the renewing power of the Gospel, it has reformed the face of the continents and made old things new. Believing in the inestimable value of every human soul, though living in base surroundings, it has built its asylums, refuges, homes, hospitals, and schools in the midst of the world's deepest degradation. Not that the record of the Church is unspotted. There are too many sullied pages in the story of her progress. Because of the jealousies, strifes, and formalism that has marked her history she may well feel herself to be an unprofitable servant. Yet if performance be the standard of comparison no religious system represented at the World's Parliament will wear laurels so bright. Nor has any faith there to be present as great a hope for the future. A merely philosophic observer, though he be not a Christian devotee, must feel the force of this position. No other religion of the world is so marked by the characteristics of inward purification, disinterested benevolence, or satisfying quality. If there be any force in these excellences they must finally win the victory. It is probable that Christianity has little to learn from Hindooism, Confucianism, and the rest. Yet she should have an open eye to this possibility and be willing to be taught by any of these oriental systems. But it is certainly the fact that she has instructions for the ancient religions of the East as to her beneficent doctrines and her benign spirit; and thus to see face to face will be one of the inestimable benefits of this expected Parliament.

CURRENT DISCUSSIONS.

EDITORIAL SALUTATORY.

To him upon whom the Church, through its constituted authority, has seen fit to lay this editorial responsibility the present seems a somewhat solemn juncture for the advent of a new editor in the office of the Methodist Review. The shadow of death lies upon the threshold we are bidden to cross, reminding us that this office door opens into eternity. Two men in succession have laid down editorial work at this table at the summons of death; two strong and cunning right hands have grown nerveless here. Scarcely silent are the echoes of memorial eulogies over the deeply lamented departure of Dr. Mendenhall, whose conduct of the Review for four years was such as to induce the General Conference to return him with enthusiasm by a large vote to a second quadrennium. The rugged, ruddy face and shaggy white head of Dr. Curry, a fine Carlylean subject for a study in color by a portrait painter, are still so little faded from the Church's consciousness that it would scarcely startle us to see the gaunt form rise and hear the nervous and incisive voice resume discussion where it was left off. So powerfully alive and pervasive was he that debaters are not yet entirely solid in the confidence inspired by the assumption that he is no longer here to answer them. If by any miracle he should reappear in this sanctum and claim the right to fill out his unexpired term the present intruder would submit without a syllable of protest and retire as far as possible into the region whence he came.

In addition to the subduing thoughts thus inevitably occurring to one about to enter on a position twice made vacant by death, it will not be deemed strange that to us, sitting down to appointed work in this fourth-floor office, the power of a personal friendship brings to fresh and vivid remembrance that eminent servant of God and the Church, Mr. John M. Phillips, a strong, wise, judicious man, essentially great, to whom, with others who might be named, this stately and commodious building, housing for a century to come the Review and other publications of Methodism, is in large degree a monument, the completion of which his eyes saw not; for while the hammers of the workmen were still sounding "God's finger touched him and he slept," honored of all men.

Conscious of these memorial shadows on this office and this building, we enter on our first experience in taking up a dead man's task. Accustomed only to living predecessors, we have sometimes availed ourselves of their experience by consulting with them. With the single exception of Dr. O. H. Tiffany, predecessor at St. James's Church, New Brunswick, N. J., all whom we have immediately followed in any position are still alive. In our present place, however, we cannot counsel with any who have occupied it, all being now numbered with

> Those faithful souls who, earning God's discharge,
> Have passed triumphant over time's dim marge
> Into the perfect peace, the life more large.

Dr. Mendenhall did his work with splendid bravery under the painful disability of increasing invalidism, suffering while he worked, the disease which was gradually consuming him lending a peculiar fiery intensity and extraordinary brilliancy to his mental action. Dr. Curry spent the waning strength of his sinewy and vigorous life upon the Review; the only man in our knowledge ever elected to any place at the age of seventy-five on a call the most distinct note in which was a demand for a young man. One man there is who will long remain most completely identified in the mind of the Church with this Review. The name and fame of Whedon fill more than a quarter of a century in the history of this office with splendor. Twenty-eight volumes of the Quarterly are a rich treasure-house of his matchless editorial work; and many years must pass, and generations that knew him not must take possession of the scene, before the Church can cease to long for another Whedon. President Raymond, of Wesleyan, truly says, "The touch of his pen was electric, and sent an intellectual thrill through Methodism with every number of the Review." In the background of the recollection of those still among us who have been longest on the stage of life appear the broad-domed brow, wide-surveying mind, and fearless spirit of McClintock, a type of man to whom one wonders why the latter half of the nineteenth century has not produced in Methodism a larger number of approximations.

Such are the men who, without bequeathing us their great brains, acquired skill, or accumulations of knowledge, have left us the formidable task of treading in their footsteps. Charles Sumner, in his closing days, expressed to a confidential friend regret that the learning and experience obtained by his long life of laborious study and severe self-discipline could not be transferred to some survivor for the continued service of mankind. A newcomer to this office has reason for deploring that the rarest property is intransmissible: the skilled master workman dies and takes his skill with him. If the Review office had as an endowment all the power, intelligence, and culture which it has held in the past, of what an estate the editor would now be administrator! But in all places the world, as to such riches, is forever beginning life over again in poverty.

Whedon's leather-covered, iron-framed chair remains here; but sitting in Whittier's seat at Holderness last summer did not make a poet, nor did the chair of an heroic martyr in the cause of human freedom increase our stock of courage. We have vainly searched this office for the dashing fountain-pen, copiously fluent, which made so sharp a mark with its diamond point upon the editorial pages of the Review during the last quadrennium. We are informed that the owner took it away with him to the General Conference last May and has not sent it back; so that a quill, which is softer and requires to be frequently dipped, must now do the work. Our predecessors seem to have been careful to leave us neither their genius nor their implements.

In the administration of President R. B. Hayes a cabinet minister, in whose office hung a number of portraits, said: "When my integrity needs strengthening I look up at Washington; when my backbone wants stiffening I turn to Stanton; and when I lack patience I take a good look at Lincoln." In this office hang no portraits, but the memory of great men gone must admonish all occupants, as Henry Martyn's picture spoke to Charles Simeon, "Be serious, be in earnest, don't trifle."

While the past of the Review thus shadows the newcomer with solemnity there are, also, in the immediate circumstances attending his accession, some peculiar elements calculated to sober any sensitive mind. Usually the selection of an editor to this office occurs at the General Conference, along with numerous other elections of perhaps greater popular interest, and, in the press of manifold business, is but an incident attracting no universal, or at least no prolonged, attention. The appointee slips quietly into his place, comparatively unobserved. In the present case the approach of the February meeting of the Book Committee found the Church sufficiently at leisure from other interests to give particular attention to the editorial vacancy in the Review, and an almost universal discussion of the needs of this office ensued. Few committees have received so large an assortment of gratuitous, yet justly interested, advice. In some of the Church periodicals symposia were invited, and a long list of eminent men called upon to enumerate the qualifications necessary to fill their ideal of the perfect Review editor. To a certain quiet observer who supposed himself unlikely to be molested by the election it seemed that the Book Committee must take one of two courses—either turn the symposium into an editorial syndicate and commit the Review to its charge, or, with the published demands of the Church before them, announce, "The man described in the order is not to be found; we therefore suspend the publication of the Review until the Church can grow the man."

The best equipped and boldest, unless a colossal egotist, might well shrink from stepping into sight in the focus of such concentrated critical scrutiny and alongside the impossible standard which has been set up. The authorities who constructed the composite ideal also declared that the man to be elected at Chicago should not be at liberty to decline. "The summons must be imperative, no matter what pulpit or chair it empties." On the other hand, an admonitory editorial voice nearer by sent out in the very week of the election this solemn warning to the appointee, whoever he should be: "All over this land in the pastorates of the churches that settle their ministers, in the bishopric" (names not given), "in college chairs, in official positions, are men with heavy hearts, who often sigh for the things they left behind and wish in the depths of their souls that they had had the resolution to say 'Nay' to the well-meaning tempter who led them from the work in which—until he came—they felt supremely blest." Editors are not specified among these wretched victims of remorse, but are manifestly included. These confusing expressions and the situation of which they are a part have caused the writer to recall the words of one who, assigned to work for which he felt himself insufficient, wrote, in 1836, "I beheld terror and dismay arrayed with acceptance, and I saw them arrayed with a refusal to accept."

The object of the Book Committee's choice, aware of an atmospheric pressure of public demand sufficient to produce suffocation, receives into his hands a subscription list swollen under the last administration to unprecedented dimensions, difficult, if not impossible, to maintain. In addition there is the feeling of regret in the Church over its failure to secure for this editorial chair the services of Dr. Henry A. Buttz, the honored President of Drew Theological Seminary.

To any who may be surprised at the latest selection we offer with sincere sympathy our personal solution of the mystery. The Book Committee, laudably cherishing a high ideal, having chosen an editor last September on the sole consideration of preeminent fitness and acknowledged scholarship, had the experience of receiving from him a declination necessitated by the needs of the position he has so long and ably filled. Other men naturally thought of and named for the editorship were too firmly rooted in places of prime importance, with critical interests dependent on their remaining, to justify the committee in risking a repetition of the September history. Thus it came to pass that, as often happens in human affairs, an endeavor which began with a pursuit of the ideal finally submitted to considerations of availability and conscripted a man from a pastoral position which any one of a hundred men could fill. To any perplexed friend of the Review, if such there be, who at present knows no other reason for the Book Committee's action, we beg leave to tender the use of this, our private theory, in explanation of what to him may appear inscrutable.

The official call of the Church found the present incumbent settled in an attractive pastorate under the eaves of a university, with free access to large libraries, reading rooms, and varied courses of lectures, affording welcome opportunity through four prospective years for wide reading, congenial study, and mental ripening, feeling no need of more conspicuous place nor craving for more arduous responsibilities amid severe demands. It is not upon his own opinion, but upon the expressed judgment of others, official and unofficial, that he ventures to attempt the duty assigned him. Not having recommended himself for this work, his responsibility begins and will end with doing the best he can in a delicate, difficult, and exacting place.

It is proper that one of the first acts of this pen should be to record that during the interim since the death of Dr. Mendenhall the Review has not suffered by the absence of an editor-in-chief, its management having been conducted with admirable skill by the Rev. Arthur B. Sanford, M.A., and its editorial pages enriched by much material from his practiced pen.

Taking up unexpectedly an unfamiliar work, it is impossible that we should have plans sufficiently matured for announcement. Inasmuch as the character of a periodical, however directed by studied adaptation to the needs of its constituency, must in great measure reflect the editorial personality and be determined by his peculiar proclivities and powers, it seems probable that the Mendenhall régime cannot be repeated, the present occupant being conscious of not possessing some of the most striking qualities which characterized that quadrennium. As to the desires of the constituency, we are impressed that, if the ideal editor who has been compositely portrayed in the denominational journals were here, he would be at a loss to know precisely what is wanted of him, for the Church itself cannot tell, or at least has not defined, what it wishes the Review to be. Not only is there no agreement of opinion, but absolutely antipodean things are suggested. A college president writes, "You come to your task with so large a supply of printed advice that you cannot miss the road to success." The advice referred to is appalling in mass and bewildering in variety, and the degree of consentaneity may be inferred from these two sample statements: "The Review should be made a quarterly publication;" "The Review should be issued monthly." The one requisite editorial attribute, the necessity of which seems to stand out most conspicuously by the combination of opinion, is omniscience.

Self-knowledge comes slowly and is apt to be imperfect. An oculist fitted glasses to other people's eyes for thirty years, looking at the radiant testing lines almost every day, without detecting an astigmatism in his own eyes which is believed to have been present most of those years. Yet we believe the record corroborates the report of self-knowledge that the new incumbent does not in anything belong to the class of brilliant beginners, but has a habit of proceeding by gradual methods which may, it is hoped, prove cumulative. Nor is he endowed with a temperament perilously oversanguine. The uncertainties besetting entrance upon an untried sphere recall the maxim of Solon: "Call no man happy till he dies." A well-known man, whose life achievements were not small and whose words were hungered for by the civilized world, said, "My father always wrote with the angel of hope looking over his shoulder, but I never expected to succeed in anything I undertook." An English historian, nearing the end of his five-volume task, wrote to a friend, "I work with scarcely an intermission from 7 A. M. to 7 P. M. I have armed myself with all philosophy for the event of a failure. When I compare my book with what I think history ought to be I am dejected and ashamed." It is comforting to observe that the work concerning which Macaulay thus wrote in 1848 has not yet outlived its usefulness or lost its place. Dr. Whedon told a near friend that, when he sent out his first number of the Quarterly in 1856, he ventured it into uncertainty between hope and fear, having no definite idea as to its quality and suitability, nor confident opinion how it would strike the mind of the Church; and added that no man is competent to be a trustworthy judge of his own work. So strong and clear and calm a man as Whedon sat in his office not knowing what the verdict would be, until the echoes of the issue had time to come back to him. Yet doubtless after public comment had spoken he was competent to criticise the verdict.

What quality of editorial matter may be possible the future will develop. That it will be uniform is not likely. Most men have times of lacking full possession of what wits they have, and forced work, done in hours of cerebral weariness and mental ineptitude, must show signs of superficiality. Whatever ideals may inspire and rule the editorial pages we shall not aim at quantity, being persuaded that in a periodical like this a pen that pauses because of a mind that meditates is better than writing currente calamo. The editor may sometimes venture into the contributors' columns, while other pens may occasionally furnish editorial materials.

Endowed undoubtedly with a fair share of the average human genius for blundering, reinforced by the inexperience of a novice, we shall, in spite of efforts at prudence, probably purchase wisdom at some cost, and become more deeply impressed than ever with the superiority of calm afterthought over the judgment of the moment. Forbearance during his apprenticeship toward one who is set to learn a new trade may fairly be asked from those whose duty or disposition is to criticise. The mastering of unfamiliar details of practical management is unfavorable, while it lasts, to purely editorial work. As the joiner of Antæus was rational in no other place but his own shop, so one in a new environment is unlikely to be at his best for serene and sound thinking until the place becomes somewhat homelike and grows to seem his own so far, at least, that he loses the feeling of an interloper expecting the return of the proper owner.

It is probably known that the gladiatorial propensity does not predominate in the new editor; yet his life has been devoted to the study of Christian truth and its defenses; and, without affirming or implying anything as to the present case, it may be permissible to address to the atmosphere the impersonal remark that here and there in the world it has been noticed that a simple sense of duty may prove adequate upon occasion to make a sufficient soldier of a man who has no militant proclivities.

If, owing to the habits of more than twenty years in the pastorate, together with a strong ancestral infusion, the preaching strain comes out unduly, it will not be surprising. If the solemn theologic mind shall be offended at the creeping in at first of something in lighter literary vein among the serious themes which custom has prescribed for the traditional Church Review, it is possible that such offense may be less frequent as the manager becomes a sadder and a wiser man.

If Dryasdust, opening the Review, notices any exuberance due to lingering youthfulness, he may check his stern impatience and comfort himself with the reflection that this will probably be tamed in the treadmill of routine; and if any capacity of learning be left in us, experience, aided by various auxiliaries, will doubtless sow some seed of graver wisdom in the furrows which after a while time and anxiety may plough.

For the literary countenance to be "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought" seems to many the proper and canonical thing, but is it wholly a misfortune if a healthy vitality occasionally paints from within upon the cheek an innocent unnecessary flush? If some day in spring, when "the lapwing gets himself another crest," a sentence on these pages shall imitate Aaron's rod and bud or even burst into bloom, we plead for it that it be not classed with worldly vanities, counted reprobate, and cut off in its sins. God's world is enormously guilty of blooming.

Our present conception regards it as the chief function of this office to concentrate the brains and scholarship of Episcopal Methodism upon the pages of the Review, the editor being the servant of the Church to invite herein a perpetual convention of the highest abilities. From the first Methodism has been characterized by exceptional mental vigor. The amount of studious and learned scholarship increases yearly. The literary possibilities of our Church are large and varied. Without reflecting upon previous management or guaranteeing the future, it may be confessed that the literary wealth of the denomination has not yet been poured into the Review as fully as is desirable; and, without depreciating the great importance of other publications, it may be said that the Review is entitled to receive, as it is expected to furnish, the richest fruits of the trained minds of the Church. The pages of non-Methodist periodicals are observed to contain powerful and brilliant articles from Methodist pens. The right of authors to use other than denominational channels for reaching the public mind is not to be denied, yet it should be possible for the home market to claim and obtain these articles. An officer of the general Church writes, "I have prayed for Methodism, that culture, scholarship, sincere truth-finding, and biblical criticism of a humble Christian spirit might come to our best literature." We invite the pactolian streams of erudition and culture, now accumulating head or diverted into other channels, to turn their current this way and drop their gold upon these pages. To a young preacher Dr. Whedon once said, "Do you know why the Quarterly is published? To teach the young men how to write." From the most virile, mature, and skilled minds among us there should come such matter as may be, in style and substance, an education and an inspiration to the younger generation of preachers and laymen. There are men now past their meridian who date some of the epochal intellectual arousements of their youth from certain articles in the Quarterly Review. In this office there is to-day no more distinct ambition than to make the Review, to its utmost possibility, helpful and attractive to our rising ministry, especially to the more than three thousand who are pursuing the courses of Conference studies, for we count that nothing is too good for them. If we could by any means bring it to pass that the Review should attain such character and value that no one of them could afford to dispense with it, great would be our joy, sufficient and gratifying would be our reward.

The Review, in our judgment, must be primarily and chiefly a periodical for ministers and for such of the more intelligent and thoughtful of our laity as are interested in themes and materials belonging to those realms of thought in which the ministerial mind needs to be at home. It cannot attempt to fill in any degree the place once occupied by the Ladies' Repository and the National Repository, or to compete with popular magazines of a general character, like the Century and Harper's Monthly. While it need not be exclusively theological, any more than a minister's education should be so, it yet must be guided and limited by the requirements of the class to whom preeminently it is sent to minister.

The Review expects to admit opinions which may not coincide with its own; to do otherwise would be to limit its scope to the editor's personal horizon. Recognizing that its mission of safe service forbids the indiscriminate admission of everything, it is yet obvious that any such publication as this is useless unless the loyal, devout, instructed, and capable intelligence of the Church is allowed freedom therein.

In 1848 Dr. John McClintock, taking charge of the Quarterly, and speaking of subjects relating to the faith, organization, usages, history, and discipline of our Church, wrote: "On all these topics we shall admit free discussion, within the limits, of course, of sound prudence and discretion. Nothing is gained to religion or to the Church by attempts to cut off investigation or to stifle honest opinions. Time was when this was thought to be a Christian duty. There are, doubtless, some who think it such still, who would shut up men's minds forever in their own narrow inclosure, putting a barrier to inquiry at the precise point which they have reached, as if wisdom must die with them. To these men every new view of the wants or duties of the Church is heresy, and all scrutiny of an old one presumption. With such we have no sympathy." After the lapse of nearly half a century of enlargement, enlightenment, and progress since those words were written it is scarcely to be supposed that there are any men still alive who are so far behind Dr. McClintock that they ought to have died not later than 1848.

The Review intends to be stanchly devoted to all that makes for the highest possibilities of Christianity in general and of Methodism in particular, counting it good fortune to belong to a Church to whose doctrines and theology it is easy for a reasonable intelligence to be substantially and steadily loyal through all the changing phases of world-thought and varying phrases of expression.

"All noble things are difficult" is the life motto of a distinguished Scotch scholar. At Niagara, Anthony Trollope found an artist attempting to paint the great falls, and said, "You have chosen a difficult subject:" to which the painter replied, "All things are difficult to a man who desires to do well." The editing of the Methodist Review is a noble work; its editor has some desire to do well; he does not expect to find it easy. With reverential awe for a lofty and sacred task, we now proceed under orders from the Church to investigate our capabilities by the experimental method, believing that life was never so well worth living to the Christian thinker nor so hopeful for mankind, and that our cherished Methodism, planning great things for God and expecting great things from him, may go forward with confidence upon a mission not yet fulfilled, rejoicing that

THE APPLICATION OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS TO SOCIAL LIFE.

THE thorough application of Christian ethics to social life is an imperative necessity of the times. This application as it is now made is in feeble, imperfect fashion, and within limited areas. It should be effected universally, and with all the intelligence and strength of which the ethicist is capable. Choicest culture and richest acquisition will here find their noblest uses.

Christian ethics are few, simple, and "easy understanded of the people." But they cover every relation of sentient life. Better understood than explained is the law of perfect love to the God and Father of all spirits, of loving one's neighbor even as self is loved, the sublimest possible development of this law being the eleventh commandment, promulgated by our Lord Jesus Christ: "A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (John xiii, 34); and also that law of equity so strikingly epitomized by the great Hillel, and yet more forcefully and in best form by Jesus of Nazareth, doing unto others as we would be done by if the relative positions of the doers were reversed.

The application of these divine rules of conduct to social life is the positive outcome of revealed religion and the normal exercise of private judgment. To study and promote it is the urgent business of every Christian. The study itself is a charming occupation, the subject studied one of the richest vouchsafements of Providence and humanity. To promote it is to take on the Christ character and to share in the bliss of the divine nature. Nothing is of greater importance to society. What is more winsome and beautiful than a typical American household, a family distinguished by the Master's life and spirit? It cannot but be that its women are pure, sweet, sunny, gentle, and gracious; its men strong, manly, courteous, and beneficent; its children vivacious, piquant, loving, and beloved. Each sex complements the other, converts domestic society into a type and prophecy of heaven, and constitutes the real unit in the indestructible fabric of American nationality. The reform of every family in this polyglot land on this model is surely the pet project of philanthropist and patriot. In achieving such reform each and every one of the major and minor Christian ethics is called into active play.

Outside the family circle Christian ethics should not be less operative. What is, not what ought to be, is the theme of political economy. Therein lies its radical defect, the default that necessarily brands it as the "dismal science." It affirms warfare to be the natural condition of society, each individual, firm, corporation, and community avariciously holding its own and covetously seizing, or attempting to seize, what is possessed by others; and that without regard to revealed ethics, which it scornfully rejects as "Sunday school politics" or as the iridescent dream of fanatical doctrinaires. Were this postulate true the bitter dictum of pessimism that "society is not worth saving" would be undeniably correct. Such society—and there is too much of it in existence—badly needs reform; nor are courageous souls, full of faith and hope in the higher possibilities of human nature, wanting who are not only willing to undertake the task, but are slowly though surely accomplishing it.

Of all who enter into business, at Boston ninety-two per cent, at Philadelphia ninety-four per cent, at New York ninety-six per cent are reported by commercial agencies as failing sooner or later. Why does the percentage of eight, six, and four in the respective cities succeed? Careful and exhaustive study of the question while preparing the material for a series of twenty-six articles on the commerce, manufactures, and insurance companies of New York led a diligent inquirer to the conclusion that —other things, such as strength, brain, culture, and opportunity, being equal—the determining factor of success is the intelligent, rigid application of Christian ethics. The successful plainly avowed this conclusion: they did not wear profession on the sleeve, but let habitual action attest the sincerity of their creed. Yet New York is not exceptional in the relative number of its philosophic business men. At other business centers they are quite as numerous and fully as emphatic in their testimony to the wisdom of divine ethics and the productive value of their incorporation with the individual and social life of the people. Neither commercial transaction nor financial obligation, in their deliberate opinion, has any adequate security, excepting what springs from the ethical sentiments and moral character of the parties thereto.

It is also true that all the enumerated elements of business success do not afford the guarantee that it will assuredly follow their operation. It is better to deserve success than to achieve it. There is something that men call chance, luck, or fate that frequently decides what shall be success and what failure. Enlightened men reverently call it providence. It is impossible to eliminate God from human affairs. Still, such is the beneficent, continuous power of Christian ethics in secular matters that prescient men cannot fail to recommend and rejoice in their application.

Thorough study of commercial exchanges, banks, and trust companies —Jews and Gentiles, Roman Catholics and Protestants—in this and other cities brings into vivid relief upon the background of intense social activities the worth of applied Christian ethics, the demonstrated fact that "godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come" (1 Tim. iv, 8). Selfishness is stupidity. Altruism, as when the disciples distributed the loaves and fishes among the hungry multitude, augments its store of blessings in proportion to the magnitude of those gifts with which it lovingly parts.

Men, personally and in the aggregate, are "slow of heart" to believe in the ethics of the great Teacher. Belief in many is clear and confident now, although it was dark and despondent thirty years ago. So blind and foolish was the majority that it practically repudiated them in relation to slavery, pauperism, intemperance, the liquor traffic, crime, and kindred evils. Taught by dire experience, they have learned the expediency of dutiful application, delight in the resultant good, and—except the Mongols from full participation in the benefit!

Intelligent and fearless application of Christian ethics to the needs of women and children, to the education of the rising generation, to the instruction of the ignorant, to the family constitution, to the relations existing between capital and labor, to private and public corporations, to the functions of civil governments, to Sabbath legislation, ecclesiastical controversies, and many other burning questions, is duty and pleasure to patriot and humanitarian. The difficulties associated with bimetallism, silver coinage, suffrage, immigration, impudent claims of anachronistic foreign potentates and powers, protection, tariff, and free trade, foreign policies, and international relations all disappear under the working of this universal solvent. Nothing is so adamantine as to resist its force, nothing so dark that it does not illumine. It concretes the abstract, gives substance to ideas, demonstrates the solidarity of all human interests, the brotherhood of man, the fatherhood of God, and the certainty of the coming millennium.

GOD'S HAND IN OUR NATION'S HISTORY.

The Columbian Quadricentennial, whose industrial exposition this month of May inaugurates, has directed the attention of all the world to American history. And the one thing concerning this history which it seems particularly appropriate here to emphasize can be no other than the divine leadings made manifest therein. That the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, ruling among the nations as well as in the hearts of men, every land proclaims. It declares also that righteousness exalteth and sin reproacheth any people, and that only those banners which are set up in the name of the All-Holy can finally triumph. All history assures us that the distinctions between right and wrong are eternal; that justice and truth alone endure; that the people which is morally corrupt becomes physically weak; and that national wickedness means national decay.

To trace the proofs of these propositions and find them illustrated in the complicated unfoldings of events, to note how Providence turns and overturns among the occurrences where human passion and greed seem to be raging in defiance of his law, and to mark the movings of a divine hand in the midst of the cross purposes of men, is an occupation of surpassing interest. And especially where one's own country is the scene of the search no more profitable theme can be proffered for study. If there is one land which, more than another, invites such investigation, surely it is this land of liberty, of law, and of religion, this free America. For, from the remotest beginnings of our career down to the present, it is scarcely possible that any candid man can refuse to recognize a divine design in operation upon this continent—a purpose which is not of earth, and which is truly marvelous to all beholders. Mere human aims and human foresight cannot explain what has occurred in connection with the discovery and the settlement, the development and the enfranchisement, of this portion of the globe. A number of particulars combine to convince the student that the same God who guided Israel has guided these United States, and that the same principles which ruled his administration of all the affairs of that ancient people rule here and now.

I. The Discovery.

In the first place, how wonderfully God reserved this continent for freedom! He hid it for long ages behind the western wave till the proper hour had struck and all was ready for its disclosure to the race. How remarkable that nothing whatever came of the discovery and partial settlement of America by the Norsemen! Lief Erickson, nearly five hundred years before Columbus, came to Labrador and proceeded down the coast as far as Rhode Island. Many explorers followed him, and some colonies were planted; but they were feeble and were soon abandoned. No importance was attached to the matter. Nothing resulted. Europe did not hear of it, and the world was neither wiser for it nor better. "The curtain which had been lifted for a moment was stretched again from sky to sea, and the New World still lay hidden in the shadows." Why was this? May we not rightly say that God threw a veil over the unexplored continent until his plans concerning it should be matured, and until the time had come when he should work out his glorious purposes? Not till the end of the Middle Ages, not till the great Reformation in Europe had emancipated the human mind and the stirrings of free thought which followed it had prepared a people who could make the best use of this grand opportunity, was the opportunity to be afforded.

II. The Possession.

When Columbus and his gallant successors had disclosed to Europe that another world lay just beyond the ocean the question arose as to who should possess it. It was a mighty question, for this was a mighty land. Nothing could be more manifest than that it was prepared by infinite wisdom to be the theater of a great race and afford a field for astonishing progress in the civilization of mankind. All the nations of western Europe apprehended something of its importance and vied with each other for its acquisition, much as they are now striving for the possession of Africa. They poured out their gold and their blood. They sent their bravest sons, their most vigorous and courageous explorers. Spain and Portugal, who had the start, did their best to get the lion's share. Holland and Sweden made earnest efforts and obtained some portion. France threw her immense resources lavishly, for some centuries, into the same endeavor. But, one after another, these all failed. Insuperable difficulties arose. Things against which no human foresight could provide met and defeated attempt after attempt. As Jehovah, through the mouth of Samuel, when the sons of Jesse passed before the prophet, rejected one after another till David appeared, so he seemed to say by the mouth of his providence to nation after nation, to throng after throng of adventurers and colonists as they passed on to these shores, "I have not chosen you, I have not chosen you, nor you, nor you," until at last England arrived, and to her was awarded the prize. God intended that Protestantism should reign here, not Romanism. He intended that the Anglo-Saxon race, not the Latin, should be the dominant power on these shores and impress upon these broad fields the highest and best sentiments of freedom. The conflict between France and England for supremacy here was especially thrilling and momentous. It was long-drawn-out and very closely contested. France seemed for much of the time to have the advantage, for she owned all the North and all the West, while England had only a little strip along the coast. But on the 10th of February, 1763, by the Treaty of Paris, after the victory of Wolfe at Quebec, the French king lost his entire possessions in the New World, and it was finally decided that the decaying institutions of the Middle Ages should not prevail this side of the sea, but that the powerful language and laws and liberties of the English race should have free range in these vast dominions. John Fiske says of his decision that it "marked the greatest turning point as yet discernible in all modern history, the most prodigious event in the political annals of mankind." Surely no one can fail to see that God was in this marvelous defeat of France after the centuries of fierce conflict in which she had engaged.

III. The Colonists.

Looking a little further and deeper, we are struck with the fact that godly men, men of marked piety and religious enthusiasm, were the ruling forces in the colonization of this country. The Pilgrims, as is well known, were a picked company of rarest worth who fled from religious persecution and sought freedom to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. In the cabin of the Mayflower, before they stepped upon Plymouth Rock, they agreed upon a covenant for the guidance of their civil affairs, in which they plainly said that "for the glory of God and the advancement of the Christian faith" they had undertaken to plant a colony. There can be no question but that the Pilgrims of Plymouth and the Puritans of Massachusetts Bay, more than any other one element, stamped their impress upon the institutions of this nation and preempted it for righteousness. And though there was a more worldly element at Jamestown, Va., yet even there the conversion of the Indians and the advancement of the divine glory thereby was especially mentioned in the charter as a prime object of the undertaking. In the Carolinas very large numbers of the French Huguenots, driven from France by the cruelest persecutions, made themselves happy homes, and so did German refugees and devout peasants from Switzerland. Georgia was founded by Oglethorpe, the philanthropist, out of pure benevolence; the motto on the corporation seal was, "Not for self, but for others;" and the Moravians, a people of the most fervent spirit, came there in large numbers. In Maryland there was opened by Lord Baltimore, a truly noble Catholic, an asylum for the persecuted of that faith; and the largest liberty, far broader and more enlightened than Massachusetts or Connecticut then knew, was there established. In the same great-hearted spirit of equal rights for all, Roger Williams, the Baptist, founded Rhode Island. And the Friends, under William Penn, who founded Pennsylvania, gave an example to all of justice and peace, innocence and truth. So, taking it all in all, it is undoubtedly true that there never was such a body of men presiding at the sources of influence, at the springs of power, in any other nation as there was in this. And here again we perceive God's hand very plainly manifest.

IV. The Revolution.

Coming down to the Revolutionary struggle, who but God could have given the victory to this oppressed people? From the human point of view everything seemed against them. Over and over again during those dreary years their cause was as desperate as could well be imagined. How could they have really expected to conquer? How could raw recruits and undrilled militia contend with veteran regiments seasoned in the wars of Europe and commanded by experienced generals? How could an empty treasury overpower a full one? What madness for this handful of scattered, impoverished colonists, strung along this exposed coast, without an army, without a navy, without money, without credit, without a central government which could do anything but advise and implore, to throw down the gage of battle to the mightiest empire on the face of the earth—an empire which had just humbled the House of Bourbon and overpowered the fleets and armies of the first nations of Europe! Looked at from both sides, the war seems to have been of God's own contriving. What madness possessed England to goad her colonists to such a pitch of fury and desperation, and thus hazard the loss of half her possessions for no final good? Some statesmen she had who saw the utter folly of it and gave warning, but they were not listened to; the uniform majority against them in Parliament was three or four to one. The rulers of England were deaf to all petitions and remonstrances from this side of the sea. They refused to listen to reason or make the slightest concession. The colonists of the period did not desire to fight. Even when they began they had no intention to really separate themselves from the mother country. It would have been very easy to have patched up terms of peace with England had there been any degree of wisdom shown on her part. Many of the most influential spirits among the colonists were for temporizing and adjusting the difficulty. They went back and forth with petition after petition; they would have consented to almost anything had there been the least conciliation shown on the other side. But no; the king and his advisers were infatuated, almost demented; they would listen to nothing. Judicial blindness, it would seem, had descended upon them from above. In the same sense in which Pharaoh's heart was hardened by Jehovah, that he should not let Israel go until judgment after judgment had come and the oppressed were all ready for freedom, so the heart of George III was hardened that he should not hearken to any compromise. In the same way that Rehoboam was led to listen to the worst counsels of his advisers and give rough answers to the people until they threw off his yoke—"for the cause was from the Lord," as the Scripture writer says—so George III was led to rush on in his selfish, perverse way till he had lost America; because God had determined that on these shores a great free nation should arise.

And when the war was in progress, the want of skill and enterprise on the part of the British generals, and the constant mismanagement by their home officials, were almost beyond belief. The distress of the colonies was also extreme, and the suffering and privation of the troops were often heartrending. God it must have been who confounded the counsels of England and carried the Americans, in spite of all, step by step, through their almost impossible undertaking. He it certainly was who gave them George Washington, without whose extraordinary abilities and marvelous merits all would most surely have been lost. And none was more ready than he to recognize the divine power and to say, "Not unto us, but unto thy name give glory." In his first inaugural address he said this: "No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency." Truly it was so. On another occasion he also said, "We have been freed from Great Britain by reiterated and astonishing interpositions of Providence." And so they had. The Almighty most clearly led our forefathers into the war, he led them all the way through it, and when they had been sufficiently chastened by suffering he brought them forth victorious.

V. The Expansion.

A map arranged to show the territorial growth of the United States is to every reflective mind a very interesting study. Nothing reads more like a romance, and nothing speaks more loudly of God, than the story of the reclamation of this continent, the filling of the wilderness with happy homes, the formation of Territory after Territory, of State after State, until now at last from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf to the Arctic Sea, our whole magnificent domain is organized into its fifty great republics federated under one banner.

The thirteen original States which wrested their freedom from Great Britain contained only 421,000 square miles. Then, in 1787, four years after the peace, out of the vast tract between the Ohio and the Mississippi was organized the great Northwest Territory, which subsequently yielded us five mighty States. Between this time and the year 1819 Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama were severally admitted into the Union. Singularly enough, these nine additional States made just 421,000 square miles additional, exactly doubling the original area. Our territory at that time stopped with the great river, the Mississippi being our western boundary. Spain held everything west of that stream, including all Mexico, and also Florida, in the southeast. In 1800 Napoleon compelled Spain to cede to France the vast tract called Louisiana—that is, all the land west of the Mississippi for its whole length, and extending northward to the Pacific Ocean. But in 1803, finding that he could not profitably manage this territory, because of many wars at home, he agreed to sell it to the United States for fifteen million dollars.

Thus at one stroke, and at a comparatively inconsiderable expense, we gained an additional million of square miles, more than doubling our previous area. We now stretched from ocean to ocean, a truly imperial domain. But God had yet more gifts in store for us. Next came the Mexican cessions, including Texas, California, Utah, Arizona, Nevada, and the rest, for which we paid sixteen million dollars, besides the blood and treasure expended in the war. This strife was undoubtedly unjust in many particulars. Nevertheless, God was in the outcome. As in regard to the British rulers long before, so now in regard to the Mexican, it seems impossible to explain the madness and infatuation and silly pride which possessed them, leading them to imagine that the course they took was wise and would result in victory for them, except on the supposition that judicial blunders from the Lord lay upon them, as upon Pharaoh and Rehoboam, it being God's purpose, for the benefit of the world and the good of the race, to put these immense tracts into our hands and under our free stable government. So we gained another million square miles. And how startling the fact that it was only a few days after the signing of the treaty with Mexico which put California into our hands that the whole world was electrified by the news that gold in fabulous quantities had been discovered on the banks of the Sacramento! Was there not a providence in this? And also in the purchase of Alaska, containing more than half a million square miles, from Russia, in 1867, for only seven million dollars? That completed what are now our possessions, the total being 3,604,000 square miles, or nearly nine times as much land as was in the old thirteen States. In round numbers, we came into possession of one million square miles by the treaty with England after the Revolution; we bought another million from France; and gained still another million from Mexico, together with half a million from Russia. The British possessions north of us will eventually become our property, and perhaps the islands south. Politicians call it "manifest destiny;" but these are meaningless words. Better is it to say "the providence of God," who designs on this continent to advance the race to a condition to which it has not as yet attained, and to work out on this magnificent field, in the centuries to come, problems which shall greatly redound to his glory and the good of mankind.

VI. The Emancipation.

Turning now to the last war, we find its prosecution marked by many traces of a divine hand, only a few of which can be mentioned. Here, as in the Mexican and the Revolutionary contests, what but God's judgment can adequately explain the marvelous blindness of the Southern leaders to the vast superiority of the North in resources and men? It was nothing less than insanity on the part of the men of the South—insanity growing out of their ignorance of the temper of the Northern States, growing out of their overweening pride, growing out of their wicked determination to keep the Negro in bondage and rule the land or ruin it; it was delusion of the wildest sort that led them to believe they could conquer the North in the fight. God allowed them thus to deceive themselves because he saw that in no other way could slavery be destroyed and the republic be purified of this great crime. The Southerners went into the war expecting to make slavery triumphant and spread it over all the continent. The Northerners, for the most part, went into the war simply to restore and maintain the Union, being convinced that there was no room on this soil for two nations with antagonistic interests. But God's intention from the start was to destroy slavery. Hence he had to withhold success from our arms until the nation had learned the lesson intended, until it was sufficiently humbled and punished, and was fully ready to do justice to the oppressed.

So, on the 21st of July, 1861, the Northern troops were beaten at Bull Run. How it amazed and galled us! We could not understand it, knowing well that our cause was just. Had any one of a dozen trifles turned out differently in that contest we should have won, and God could easily have ordered it that we should win. But had we done so slavery would to-day, in all probability, still be spreading its baneful blight over the land. It was the same way with the disasters on the peninsula before Richmond in May and June of the following year. We had a splendid army, we had advanced within a few miles of the capital, the rebel forces were shattered, and but for inaction on the part of the commanding general — mysterious at the time and ever since—the capital of the Confederacy, as we now know, could have been easily taken. But no, it was not to be. We were not yet ready to do justice to the slave, and God would not bless us. Then followed Lee's invasion of Maryland and the slaughter of twenty thousand men on the bloody but indecisive battlefield of Antietam. Victory was still withheld from us. But we were beginning to understand what God meant. Good men throughout the North had been praying and speaking, and the eyes of the people were opening to the truth. So President Lincoln, feeling at length that the nation would sustain him, in accordance with the solemn vow he had made before the Lord that if Lee were driven back he would do justice to the bondman, on the 22d day of September, 1862, issued an order which electrified the world, announcing that on the 1st of the next January the slaves should all be free. And when those hundred days of public notice had expired came the great proclamation which emancipated four millions! From that moment God granted victory to the armies of freedom. Vicksburg and Gettysburg came that summer, and after that wonderful Fourth of July which gave us those two crowning mercies, though it took us almost two years more to finish the conflict, the issue was no longer doubtful—the end was in sight. We had learned that liberty and union must stand or fall together, and that the accursed wrong of holding property in man, which we had been so long clasping to our bosom, must be definitely and forever put away before we could possibly have peace. The war had to continue, as Lincoln so well said, till the wealth piled by unrequited toil had been sunk and every drop of blood drawn with the lash had been expiated by another drawn with the sword. So true and righteous altogether are the judgments of the Lord.

Of minor providences connected with the great struggle there are very many that might be mentioned. Who can forget how the nation was thrilled when the Monitor, on the 9th of March, 1862, in the opportune moment, arrived at Hampton Roads, on the very day when the ironclad Merrimac would otherwise have easily destroyed our shipping and moved on to the devastation of the Northern ports? How came that strange little "cheese box," as the rebels derisively termed her, that turreted novelty, that triumph of the genius and science of Ericsson, the Swede, to be there precisely when the danger was greatest and the need absolute? Had any one of a hundred things intervened that might to human eyes most easily have happened, she had been too late, the blockade would have been broken, and everywhere our wooden ships would have been readily sunk. But God was clearly in the occurrence, and all events obeyed his will to save our nation.

Who but God gave us Abraham Lincoln, that marvel of the nineteenth century, as Washington was of the eighteenth? It was not our wisdom that selected him. We knew him not. He was a plain, untried man. Nobody understood what was in him any more than they did what was before him. He did not himself understand. It was the Almighty who brought him forward and put him at the head of the nation, the one man for the hour, to guide us through that awful storm. The same may be said of General Grant, and of many of the other leaders, both civil and military, such as Stanton and Chase, Seward and Sumner, Sherman, Sheridan, and Thomas. This noble group was raised up for our deliverance as plainly as Moses and Joshua and David were raised up to emancipate the enslaved Israelites and establish the Jewish nation. Men were given us in the time of our need, and also money, which was no less essential. The exhaustless mines of gold and silver on the Pacific slope, on both sides of the Rockies, and in the Sierra Nevadas, there hid since the world began, were discovered and developed in the exact time to meet the great emergency. The slave power had failed to get control of that vast region, and though so far away—with no railways then joining them to the East, and with many temptations to organize for themselves—the men of the Pacific proved true to the Union and to freedom, and poured out their treasure like water to save the day.

Surely we have said enough to show that there is a God in this history, a God who rules among the affairs of men, appointing the bounds of their habitation and giving the kingdom to whomsoever he will. It is only the fool who can say in his heart there is no God, or none that concerns himself with human duty and destiny. The wise man will heartily acknowledge God's presence and power among us, and will set himself to cooperate with the divine plans. Only thus as evil of every kind is put away, and as we become a truly Christian nation, not in name only, but in deed—only as righteousness prevails among us and wickedness departs—can there be genuine and lasting prosperity. The ideal citizen is not the anarchist or the atheist, the infidel or the agnostic, but the man that loves and fears God. For it is religion more than aught else which made this republic what it is, and the growth of scriptural piety means the growth of everything besides that the nation needs.

PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.

Cosmopolitanism is the genius of the age into which men have now come. In contrast with the illiberality of other days this means a broader taste and a larger flexibility of adaptation to new environments; in comparison with the older self-absorption it implies a deeper concern for the affairs of other men and an heroic devotion to their good. The relation of the individual to the race was never broader, as well as closer, than at the present. In a true and increasing sense every man belongs to the world, and the world to every man. The scientific progress of the age, if we come to inquire the cause of this cosmopolitanism, in some degree nourishes the sense of universal citizenship. There is an advance in linguistic skill. The incomprehensible dialects of Pentecost would be intelligible now. The scholar is often a man of many tongues. At the very antipodes it were possible to speak one's mother language and find an intelligent listener. The ease of international communication also brings the individual into closer relations with his distant brethren. The morning journal condenses the doings of the wide world on the preceding day. For the expenditure of a trifle one may establish telegraphic connection with India or China and talk with some living soul upon the heights of the Himalayas or along the Great Wall of the Chinese empire. Time is annihilated; and while the clocks of the world make but a single swing of their pendulums a man's voice to his fellow-man has traversed the globe. And the facilities of travel also contribute to the increase of the cosmopolitan spirit. Man is naturally a peripatetic. To the gratification of his ambition for travel there can be but one successful hinderance—and that is the impossible. With which disposition to travel he is, in these later days, a resident of all lands. The world was never narrower. The twenty-five thousand miles of the earth's circumference have shrunk to a span. Escape from others is practically impossible; the world is a resounding whispering gallery; the eagle-eyed detective looks into every corner of the world to apprehend the criminal. The tour of the globe is a lesser journey now than was Abram's expedition of a few hundred miles from Mesopotamia. The steamship can circle the globe almost as quickly as the camels of the Jewish patriarch, with their heavy hoofs, made the ever historic pilgrimage into Canaan. Under such circumstances of rapid travel it is never necessary for the traveler to say farewell to his fellows; the tourist that one meets to-day under the shadows of the Pyramids or along the streets of Peking he may greet to-morrow in the drawing-room festivities of America. And under such circumstances a man feels himself a citizen, not only of his own community and state, but of every government and of all municipalities. The earlier provincialism is no longer possible. To man's education, jurisprudence, commerce, and scientific progress he cannot be indifferent; in the amelioration of human pain and wretchedness he must be interested; and for the universal establishment of morality the inevitable drift of settlement now forces him to feel a concern. So does the whole world become at once his property, his care, and his rejoicing.

THE republic of Liberia clearly merits its enrollment among the governments of the earth. Established in one of the more obscure corners of the globe, and maintaining a quietude which is unbroken by the commotions of kings and princes or by the invasions of foreign warriors, its onward progress is too little noticed. If some nations, like individuals, are retiring and unboastful, to this class Liberia certainly belongs. She does not enter into competition with the larger governments of the world for territorial possessions; she never plays the rôle of dictator in international councils; she does not bid for the world's plaudits with the blare of trumpets and spectacular display. Yet on account of her sterling qualities this little republic upon the African coast is not to be lightly esteemed. Such a tribute to her excellences, for instance, as is set forth in the Seventy-sixth Annual Report of the American Colonization Society is at once deserved and instructive. For more than forty-five years, according to this showing, Liberia has existed as an independent republic. Twenty-three administrations have in this period quietly succeeded one another, during which time the republic has "exercised the functions of a national government, having executive, legislative, and judicial departments, keeping peace and order within her own borders, collecting and disbursing revenues, holding diplomatic intercourse with other nations, and establishing a system of common schools." Covering an area of 95,000 square miles, and numbering a population of some 1,250,000, all of whom belong to the Negro race; blessed with a forest verdure of "unspeakable beauty and grandeur;" possessing a flora which is unusually "rich and varied;" and growing all the tropical vegetables and fruits with luxuriance, Liberia is surely one of the garden spots of the great continent of Africa. That the republic has maintained its autonomy and vigor for nearly half a century, though under the condition of a somewhat elementary civilization, is a striking testimony to the latent strength of character of the African Negro, and is not an insignificant prophecy of future prosperity. The truthfulness of the words of Henry Clay was never more evident in the history of Liberia than now, that it is "a republic founded by black men, reared by black men, maintained by black men, and which holds out to our hope the brightest prospects." But the emigration to Liberia of the American Negro should inspire an additional and most practical interest in the well-being of this African republic. Probably too few realize the steady exodus to the African shores of our blacks which has been going on for three quarters of a century. For the furtherance of this object the American Colonization Society was organized seventy-six years ago. Commencing its work four years later, it has yearly since then sent emigrants to Liberia. At the present date it can show a total of 16,413 colonists, besides 5,722 recaptured Africans, whom it has helped to settlement upon the African shores. Added to this enumeration of actual results, the further item is not unimportant that the applications for help Africa-ward have increased during the past year, have come from Northern as well as Southern States, and now reach many thousands in number. The United States cannot be indifferent to these facts. While it is too much to expect that our entire black population could ever be induced to emigrate—because of their sometimes considerable investments here, their home associations, or their natural dread of an expedition across the seas into untried scenes—yet at least a partial solution of the Southern question may lie in the furtherance of African colonization. The strong and commanding republic of the New World should, therefore, wish a hundredfold prosperity to the weaker republic of the Old. All sympathy and good wishes to Liberia!

SHALL the death penalty be abolished as an inhumanity which should cease with the passing century? The vigorous agitation looking to this end has not only found some place of late in the public prints, but has also attained to the importance of legislative discussion and action. Concerning particular instances of the death sentence which provoke on the part of many sentimentalists a clamorous demand for gubernatorial interference it would be unbecoming here to speak. Yet, as all injustice of any sort calling for rectification is emphasized in such specific instances, these are valuable as instigators of public interest and action. The question is as old as the generations. To throw a human being into the dungeon for his murderous assault upon another; to subject him to the rigors of a judicial process; to condemn him to the extreme penalty known to men: and to put out, like the extinguishment of a bright-burning taper, the life which God has given, seems, from the standpoint of the sentimentalist, an act of indefensible brutality. That the criminal has blotted out another human life which was equally or perhaps more valuable is, in the estimate of right thinkers, the only justification for his arraignment, and the sole warrant for the temerity of the human judge in assuming the functions of the greater Judge and in pronouncing the sentence of death. But in discussing the ethics of the death penalty the primary object of capital punishment should, we contend, be taken into consideration. And such purpose is evidently that the execution shall act as a deterrent as well as be punitive in itself. The lesser visitations of the law are for the same end. It is right that theft and arson and bribery shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, not only that the guilty may themselves feel the stings of remorse and have opportunity for reformation of life, but also that others in our communities with the same evil tendencies may take warning and practice a wholesome self-restraint. To abrogate the statutes covering the punishment of these lesser offenses would be to usher in a reign of terror and of multiplied crimes. The analogy clearly holds. The murderer must be punished for the prevention of other murders. Easy are the approaches to this supreme crime.

Some great affront, in the estimate of the enraged man, has been given, his jealousy or wrath has perhaps been strengthened by strong drink, that factor in so many crimes; passion for the time being takes the reins and drives on the headlong steeds. It is sadly prophetic to say that, as a consequence, there will always be murders. To hedge about the commission of the crime with as many deterrents as possible and to clothe its punishment with the most awful solemnities seem, therefore, the part of civic wisdom as well as of religion. And, because the death penalty, by whatever method, appears the most awesome of all deterrents, we must believe in its continuance.

The popular outbreak in Belgium is but the continuation of the old struggle for equality which has filled all lands and centuries. Divested of their superfluous settings, these late Belgian riots are but the protest of the common people against the rejection of the liberal electoral bill by the Chamber of Deputies—though the dominant authorities had encouraged the anticipation of the passage of this measure. Clearly the masses have a grievance. An examination of the electoral body in Belgium shows the astounding fact that only between two and three per cent of the total population enjoy the right of suffrage. Nor do they seem to be excluded from this freeman's privilege through lack of educational or property qualification. But, as in other lands where caste is dominant and social distinctions are intrenched in the customs of the centuries, the aristocracy have held the scepter in their bejeweled hands and are loath to let go their sovereignty. It is simply the contest between the purse-proud aristocracy and the brawny masses—a contest which enlists the sympathy of all sturdy manhood, and a contest in which the patrician must ultimately suffer defeat. The occurrence of such a demonstration as that happening in Belgium directs attention to the generic principle of popular suffrage, than which no principle is more vital to national perpetuation. We are not of those who would grant the voter's franchise indiscriminately to men. Too carelessly has this priceless privilege been conferred in the past. A mistake has been made, it is to be feared, in the United States. However just the conferring of the freeman's right in our earlier national history, when the population was sparse and immigration invited, the desirability of restricting suffrage is now the conviction of all who have eyes to see. The old arguments for certain qualifications as a prerequisite to the exercise of the voter's privilege gather new force with the years. Perhaps there should be a property qualification, though not one which is burdensome and unjust. Certainly there should be an educational requirement. The schoolhouse should be the gateway to the polls; an instructed citizenship will insure a healthy and progressive commonwealth. Yet under right restrictions the privilege of electoral rights should be granted to the last citizen entitled thereto. The trend of the age is toward democracy. The masses are coming to the front; and soon these untitled masses shall, in justice, direct the governments of the earth.

THE ARENA.

THE MORAL AND SPIRITUAL STATUS OF INFANT CHILDREN.

WHATEVER may be affirmed in creeds and confessions of faith, the doctrine of unconditional election and reprobation is no longer taught from evangelical pulpits. The dogma which Calvin himself styled a horribile decretum is exploded. God's saving scheme of mercy embraces the race. "As by the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." The death sentence is canceled, pardon is graciously bestowed, and life is secured. No soul will perish because of the first transgression in the garden. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

The moral and spiritual status of children may be legitimately inferred from the teaching of prophets, of apostles, and of Christ himself. The offspring of fallen parents have no inherent purity. Adam begat a son in his own likeness. The child inherits lapsed faculties and alienated appetencies; it has no birthright to heaven. A Saviour is needed and redemption is accomplished; the ransom is paid. But redemption is not salvation In personal salvation justification and regeneration are the essential elements in every case of infants and adults. Justification is pardon, but "justification unto life" manifestly implies regeneration, which signifies the new life. The words of Christ to Nicodemus set forth the qualification without which no soul can enter into the kingdom of God—on earth or in heaven: "Ye must be born again!" "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." The spiritual birth is the beginning of the new life. It is a birth into the kingdom—a new creation. God's "free gift" is unconditional, securing complete personal salvation to all before actual sin has been committed. Regeneration, which is coordinate with justification in personal salvation, is also spontaneous; without it the soul is but half saved.

The Bible clearly teaches that infants are personally saved; the words of Christ are explicit: "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Again, "Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." On such New Testament teachings Dr. Scott emphatically says:

> Infants are as capable of regeneration as grown persons; and there is ground to conclude that all those who have not committed actual sin, though sharing in Adam's offense, will also share in the blessings of the second Adam's gracious covenant without personal faith and obedience; but not without the regenerating influences of the Holy Spirit."*

In substantial agreement with Dr. Scott, Richard Watson says:

> We are bound to conclude that in some sense the kingdom of heaven is composed of little children; they are its subjects and partakers of its blessings. If children are subjects of Christ's spiritual kingdom on earth, then, until the moment that by actual transgression they bring condemnation on themselves, they remain heirs of the kingdom of glory; and if they remain heirs of the latter by divine appointment, then a previous vital connection must have existed on earth between them and Christ as their redeemer and sanctifier.*

* Commentary, Matt. xix, 13, 14.

Dr. Nast, while in harmony with Drs. Scott and Watson as to the salvation of infant children, assumes that they are not cleansed and qualified for heaven till in the moment of death. He says:

> The Holy Spirit effects more in the salvation of infants that die than in those that grow up to years of understanding. The reason of it lies in the difference of the circumstances under which he is pleased to save them. We cannot conceive of regeneration in a child before it has awakened to self-consciousness. This takes place in the dying child at the hour of death, when the spirit leaves the body. It is regenerated in the very moment when the soul leaves the body and awakens to self-consciousness. †

Thus the learned doctor, by bold assumption, solves the problem, without any warrant whatever from the inspired word. But let us see what his assumption implies. If the spiritual birth occurs the moment before death, why might it not take place at any previous moment of the child's existence? It is clear that the cleansing could not take place the moment after the spirit's release from its clay tenement, since its mortal life would have ceased to exist prior to that moment.

Turning to our book of Discipline, Paragraph 43, we read:

> We hold that all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God, and therefore graciously entitled to baptism.

This kingdom is manifestly spiritual and invisible, while baptism initiates the subject into the outward or visible kingdom—the Church of Christ. But what is baptism? Let us see. It is "a sign of regeneration or the new birth." ‡ God in his ancient Church did "appoint divers baptisms, figuring thereby the renewing of the Holy Ghost." § Again, "Remembering always that baptism doth represent unto us that inward purity which disposeth us to follow the example of our Saviour Christ." ‖ Baptism is "the outward sign of an inward grace." It is the symbol of "the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost."

Why are children proper subjects of baptism? We answer that it is because we hold that they are already members of Christ's spiritual kingdom; because of inward purity; because unregenerate persons—whether infants or adults—cannot be members of the kingdom of God. In the books consulted in the examination of this subject no text of Scripture has been cited in support of the assumption that God has a purpose and method for saving the dying child which do not apply to those who live till they come to years of understanding. The very thought is unworthy of the Author of salvation. Why bestow special blessings upon those who are about to be gathered into the fold of the Good Shepherd, and withhold them from those who live to do battle with sin and Satan?

during the tender years of childhood, unaided by regenerating grace? God has but one scheme of mercy and but one method of salvation. He saves infants and adults by the same method. He saves all and evermore where there is not positive resistance of his Spirit and truth. Prevenient grace antedates all effort, purpose, and desire for a new heart. The first divine influence which quickens the conscience, creating a desire for a purer and better life, is initial salvation, and but for resistance would lead to the cross and to the fountain of healing. Little children do not resist; they do not reject Christ, and grace saves them.

If all infants are personally saved before coming to years of understanding, why do they not retain their infantile piety? Why do they reject the good and choose the evil? We answer, there are a few found in our churches who, like Timothy and Samuel, have known and loved the Lord from the earliest period of their lives. Two of the most devoted and useful ministers the writer has ever known were of this class. They knew nothing of the bitter cup of repentance. They could give no account of the date and circumstances of their conversion. They had no recollection of a day in life when they did not love the Lord and devoutly implore his blessing to rest upon them. They were deeply spiritual and eminently useful. They have gone to their reward. Every pastor, it is believed, has known individuals who were upright in life, God-fearing, and deeply anxious to be the disciples of Christ, and yet they remained out of the Church. Why did they not profess Christ and become identified with his people? They feared to take so important a step simply because they had been exhorted to "repent and be converted." They could not weep, neither could they agonize to enter in at the strait gate. They had, as we believe, remained in the fold from infancy; they had not lost the fruits of God's "free gift" which had secured to them "justification of life."

Intelligent, patient, tender, and watchful instruction by parents would save multitudes from wandering away from the fold. O, how much every household needs a faithful Eunice and a loving Lois to train the babes in the nurture and admonition of the Lord! The scheme of mercy and the blessed home influences which saved Timothy ought to be able to keep all the lambs within the fold of the Good Shepherd. Errors in belief and erroneous teaching have resulted in fearful loss to the Church, and in untold sadness to Christian fathers and mothers.

"DEFINITION OF FREE WILL."

In his definition of free will it seems to me that F. G. Nagle, of Pacific Grove, Cal., is wide of the mark. He says: "Free will is a mental or spiritual development which enables the possessor to act according to an ideal, regardless of fleshly inclinations." *

With all respect I offer the following criticisms: 1. Will is not a "development," but is inherent. It is a part of the constitution of the mind, the same as the intellect and sensibilities are. 2. "To act," if he means the performance of the deed, as I suppose, has nothing whatever to do with free will. To will is one thing, but to perform that which is willed is quite another. The will-action is free even without the deed-action. 3. An "ideal" of right or good toward which the will is free to act has no place in the definition of this word. If the will has not power to act contrary to any "ideal," whatever that may be, it is not free. Freedom implies powers of alternative choice. It may see and approve the right but still the wrong pursue. It may mock its own "ideal" and choose the opposite.

* Methodist Review, January-February, 1893, p. 133.

Will is a distinct faculty of the mind, possessing powers of alternative choice, influenced, it may be, by motives of good or by passions of evil, but necessitated by nothing and without limit in its operations. It may choose even to dethrone the Almighty. The "limitation" comes in the execution, not in the will-action.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO NATURE.

THE various animadversions elicited by an article published in the January–February number of the Methodist Review, and entitled "The Gospel in Nature," indicate that the subject is receiving further investigation. All my critics desire apparently nothing but the truth, and yet it is a little remarkable that no two perceive the same difficulties. One intimates that a new line of thought has been started, and that time is needed for its examination. It is clear to us that the Review article has not, as a whole, been correctly understood; hence it has not been critically examined. So far as noticed not a point has been made against our thesis, and as space will not allow us to set our critics right, one by one and item by item, we will content ourselves to cover the whole ground in a general way, mostly by reiterating what may be found in the article itself on the questioned points. It is there held:

1. That the earth was, when pronounced "very good," intended to be for man not only a place of abode and a school for intellectual development, but a divinely appointed sanctuary of worship, and that its adaptations were as complete in one respect as another.

2. That such was the fullness with which the Creator revealed himself and his will to man through his works, and such the clearness his spiritual life gave to spiritual vision, together with the creature's direct access to the Father and the tree of life, that a written revelation, such as ours, was unnecessary.

3. That, as taught by Wesley, Watson, and Clarke years ago, man sinned, died spiritually, and dropped down from the plane of spirituality —his intellect becoming "beclouded," though not injured per se, and his appetite and passion receiving an abnormal growth; but that he was arrested in his fall by the provisions already made in the atonement, and is not hopelessly lost.

4. That, "as creation as a whole formed a unit, a disturbance in any one of the departments affects disastrously the whole;" and in another place we say "that the place assigned to man in nature was so vast that his lapse disturbed the whole." Dr. Bovard will perceive that in not "designing" to defend a position I did not take I did not so grievously sin.

5. That, as "nature is the product of divine thought, and man its head and front, in its intellectual and moral departments its teachings should blend with revelation and be duplicated whenever they occupy the same ground; that, as the original system was 'very good,' if the second came from the same source it must be a reproduction of it—a second edition, only in another form; that as the first was adapted to the condition of sinless man, the second should be so modified and enlarged as to be suited to the fallen and the spiritually dead."

6. We attach supreme value to the "lily," not for what it is per se, but for what in the hands of its Maker it may do as a teacher; so of the entire constitution and laws of nature.

7. In saying that during his ministry Christ made but little use of the Old Testament Scriptures we simply stated a fact palpable to every one; but Dr. Bovard understands our words to mean that he attached but little value to them. We beg his pardon; we did not suppose our words could possibly receive such a construction, especially as we affirmed that he gave the Old Testament the sanction of his authority; that the teachings of Moses, the prophets, and the Psalms were the word of the Lord to the people, etc. Dr. Bovard's challenge "to produce from nature a single teaching on the atonement" we would gladly accept did space permit; as it is, we refer him to Butler's Analogy.

Our article has now answered for itself the objections raised by our critics. It is, in fact, but a single thought which is more largely developed in our work, The Anatomy of Atheism, Demonstrated in the Light of the Laws and Constitution of Nature, published by Cranston & Curts.

DR. STRONG'S SELF-CORRECTION.

Please allow me a brief criticism on my own criticism of Mrs. Sarah F. Adams's favorite hymn (No. 724 of our Hymnal) in the March–April Review. On reading my article in print I wish to modify the implication (p. 264) that the measure is necessarily iambic, which does indeed on the main fit the words and is the most frequent in English verse. I perceive, however, that it may also be scanned as dactylic—a very unusual species, thus:

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee.

And this appears to be the view of it in the music to which it is set in our "Hymnal with Tunes." On the former plan there are twelve violations of prosody in the entire hymn, besides those of the initial phrase so often repeated, and on the latter there are nine—not much gain.

THE ITINERANTS' CLUB.

COURSE OF MINISTERIAL STUDY FOR THE QUADRENNIUM.

Under the caption "Exegetical Theology," we may, for the purpose of this paper, without impropriety, include not only the study of the exegesis of the Scriptures, but those related studies which are preliminary to it. In one sense all studies for the ministry are preliminary to exegesis. Indeed, the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures is the supreme function of the Gospel preacher. In the address to those to be ordained elders the bishop says: "And seeing that ye cannot by any other means compass the doing of so weighty a work, pertaining to the salvation of man, but with doctrine and exhortation taken out of the Holy Scriptures, and with a life agreeable to the same; consider how studious ye ought to be in reading and learning the Scriptures, and in framing the manners, both of yourselves and of them that specially pertain unto you, according to the rule of the same Scriptures; and for this selfsame cause, how ye ought to forsake and set aside, as much as you may, all worldly cares and studies."

Again, the bishop asks: "Are you persuaded that the Holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all doctrine required of necessity for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ?" Since, then, the Bible is the supreme arbiter of doctrine and duty, of the things we are to believe and preach, it is all-important that the minister shall be trained in the exact meaning of the sacred writings. Hence the course laid down for our young preachers in this department is fundamental, and includes:

"First year: Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, the Old Testament; Exegetical Studies in the Pentateuch."

"Second year: Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, the New Testament; Exegetical Studies in the Gospels."

"Third year: Exegetical Studies in Isaiah."

"Fourth year: Exegetical Studies in the Pauline Epistles."

The sphere of Biblical Introduction is very broad. What it should include and what it should exclude has been widely discussed. The mode of approach to the study of the Bible, whether by the old isagogical method or the later historical method, whether as accepted in its entirety as a full and complete revelation of God, or whether as still on trial to be investigated and to be discarded if not satisfactory to the student, are matters which are still under consideration by the scholarly world. It is well for the minister to remember, however, that before his entrance on the ministry he has had a personal religious experience, which connects itself directly with the doctrine of the inspiration of the Old and New Testament Scriptures. Whatever they may be to others, to him they are not on trial, but are already accepted, and his experience is in harmony with their teachings. He cannot, therefore, approach the study in the spirit of pure criticism, but in the spirit of reverent affection and love.

His duty toward the Scriptures, therefore, is not that of a critic, but that of a disciple who has received their doctrines and desires to expound them faithfully to the world. This does not, however, exclude thorough investigation of the foundations upon which his faith rests. Therefore the study of the Introduction to the Scriptures is absolutely necessary.

What is included in the Introduction may be comprehended under Canon of the Scriptures, Biblical Philology, Text Criticism, Archæology, Hermeneutics, and, in a wider sense, perhaps, the Evidences of Revealed Religion. To these studies the candidate for the ministry should devote himself with great industry during his course.

It is to be noted that the Exegetical Studies are progressive. Beginning with the Pentateuch, they pass to the gospels; then to the Pauline epistles and the prophecy of Isaiah. The careful study of these books, with the studies introductory to them, include the study of the profoundest problems of modern biblical thought. Some one has said that the roots of all the questions of Old Testament literature are found in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, and certainly the foundations of all New Testament questions center in the four gospels. In Isaiah the prophetical aspects of the Old Testament reach their culmination, and in the Pauline epistles the complete development of Christian theology is exhibited. Richly endowed, indeed, in knowledge, in critical acumen, and in spiritual insight will he be who has carefully studied this course as laid down in our book of Discipline. Until the General Conference of 1884 exegesis was not insisted upon as a part of the Conference curriculum for candidates for the ministry. It is now assigned to its appropriate rank.

The value of purely exegetical studies in mental training and in securing entrance to the very rich treasures of God's word need not at this time be insisted upon. It is a maxim in theological thought that a good exegete is a good theologian, and he who keeps most nearly to the very words in which the Holy Ghost communicated sacred truth will most fully understand the mind of the Spirit.

THE YOUNG MINISTER.

THERE are two priesthoods recognized in the New Testament—that of all believers, by which each comes to God with his own sacrifice of a "broken and a contrite heart," and that of teaching and of official service, by which those specially designated of God make known his truth to the people. "And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." In the New Testament sense they are not properly priests, but "ministers of the word." The Christ whom they preach is both priest and sacrifice, and their constant cry is, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!"

The glory of the minister's office is derived from the Master whom he represents and the grandeur of the message which he is commissioned to announce. He represents the King of kings, and proclaims on his behalf pardon to his rebellious subjects. "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." No one can enter upon such a work without asking anxiously, "Who is sufficient for these things?"

This is the case with a young man who is conscious that he has been called of God to the work of the ministry. The magnitude and difficulty of the service almost overwhelm him, and he raises the inquiry, "How shall I fit myself to enter upon this sacred office?" Of natural gifts and spiritual graces we need not speak. It is a safe assumption that God calls no one to his work who has not the qualities of mind and heart which, when cultivated, will effectively serve his cause.

The Church exercises a careful guardianship over those who profess to be thus called, and inquires whether they have "gifts, grace, or usefulness." Those whom the Church designates as candidates for the ministry at once confront questions of great moment, not to themselves alone, but to the Church in which they are to minister. Some of these questions which are likely to arise in the minds of those looking forward to the ministry we propose to consider.

1. Does the call to the ministry include the call to enter immediately upon the work of preaching the Gospel? This question must be answered in the light of experience and of history. That there have been and are those who feel, "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel" now, is evident. The majority, however, of those who are called in early life are called with a view to preparation rather than to immediate service.

This is the present conviction of the Church as expressed in her extensive arrangements for the education of young preachers. All branches of Christianity have educational societies to help those who are looking forward to the ministry and who are too poor to bear the entire expense. The establishment of academies, colleges, and theological seminaries under the direct control of the Church shows the extent of the course which she thinks important for them to pursue. At the end of the course they are finally examined, in order to test whether they have passed successfully in the required studies. The Church further enjoins upon all who enter the ministry a four years' course, through which every young man must pass in order to full ordination to her service. It is clear that the Church recognizes the call to the ministry to be a call to get ready, by a right course of spiritual and mental discipline, for its exalted functions.

This is further apparent from the study of the lives of those most successful in preaching the Gospel. It is largely true of those who have led the thought of the Church. Jonathan Edwards, the great metaphysician and theological writer, in the days when separate biblical schools did not exist, spent two years after graduation in preparing for his special work. He realized that his first duty was to prepare. The same was true of our own great writer and commentator, Dr. D. D. Whedon. It is also true of the most noted revivalists. President Finney, of Oberlin, whose life and work are still an inspiration to all who labor for the salvation of souls, realized the same thing and employed his wealth of theological learning in directing men to the cross of Christ.

Without denying God's call of specially qualified men to enter directly on their ministerial labors, it is manifest that most of those who are called to preach the Gospel are thereby called to make the best possible preparation for the sacred office.

PRESERVATION OF MATERIALS.

BECAUSE of the continued interest felt in the preservation of sermonic materials, we add a further letter upon the subject from one of the thoughtful readers of the "Itinerants' Club" department:

EDITOR ITINERANTS' CLUB: The book with which I would part last—the Bible, of course, excepted—is of my own making. I have worked in its construction for several years, and expect to do so as long as I work at all. Its value is already beyond my anticipation when I began it, and increases with accelerating speed. In short, my most valuable book is a key, a skeleton key, which at once unlocks nearly all the treasuries of my reading, and secures as in a safe gems which otherwise would be scattered beyond redemption. I have carefully studied the methods of others, but have not yet found reasons for altering my own. Only a conviction that the adoption of such a plan increases the facility and efficiency of a minister's work prompts me to add this article to the many which have been written on the subject.

After sufficient experimenting to assure myself of the wisdom of my plan I purchased a large ledger containing between five and six hundred pages. Instead of setting apart special pages for special subjects I fill in the pages solidly as I advance. The alphabetical index contains the subjects upon which entries have been made. As I read a book, a magazine, a paper, I enter upon the pages of my ledger the subject of importance, whether it be a chapter, a paragraph, an illustration, an analysis, and then simply put the number of the page after the subject as contained in or added to my index. In entering the subject I refer to the book, magazine, paper, or to my file case for clippings, of which I shall speak. For example, on the resurrection of Christ, according to my index, I have references to my reading on pages 2, 27, 45, 49, 53, etc., of the ledger, for the most part references to valuable material which otherwise I could not refind without great labor, if at all. Indeed, I find I have written out suggestive arguments, a happy illustration, and many other things which I could have preserved in no other way with equal ease and compactness.

In the latter part of the ledger I have set apart pages for the several books of the Bible, and here I enter without individual index reference all matters pertaining to the special treatment of the book, chapter, and text, references to valuable sermons in my books, or other material. I have this so arranged that in a moment I can discover if I have anything on the text in hand. For example, on page 138 I have references to articles, sermons, and expositions, in file case, in Homiletical Review, in volumes on my shelves, on many texts in Hebrews.

In the reading of the daily or weekly papers I find clippings of two sorts, to be referred to as subjects or as texts. I have a file case, prepared by Rev. J. C. Thomas, in two parts—one a system of alphabetically indexed envelopes or flaps, the other arranged with an envelope for each ten chapters of the Bible, or for any book when it contains less than that number. Anything filed in either of unusual value I enter also in my ledger simply F. C. (file case in loco).

This system is as simple as possible for the purposes it serves. It is compact, no waste pages being left in the ledger. It allows of indefinite extension. It covers the whole range of reading.

"THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST." (Rom. viii, 9.)

The passage of which this phrase is a part reads as follows: "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." The question to be considered is, What is meant by "the Spirit of Christ?" Some have maintained that the word "Spirit" here means temper or disposition, and that the phrase "Spirit of Christ" means no more than "the Christian spirit." Such a dilution of this very suggestive passage has no support from the context or from general usage. That the Holy Spirit is referred to immediately before is clear and unquestionable. The word "Spirit" does not occur in the sense of disposition of mind in the previous chapter, and is here introduced to mark the great transition from the condition of conflict between the mind and the flesh into that of victory in which there is "no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus."

In the previous part of this verse "the Spirit of God" is employed, which is evidently the same as the "Spirit of Christ." Here the Spirit is that of God and of Christ, concerning both of whom it is affirmed that they dwell in believers. Meyer says: "The Spirit of Christ is no other than the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of God. He is denominated the Spirit of Christ because the exalted Christ imparts himself in and with the Paraclete (John xiv, 16), and because whoever has not this Spirit is not a member of Christ."

This admitted exegesis of the passage is of special importance. It is a statement of the distinguishing possession of a child of God. The "Spirit" is the indwelling presence which constitutes us partakers of the divine nature. The immediate connections of this passage are significant as showing the prominence assigned to the Holy Spirit in the Christian life. He is the medium of communion between man and God, and must be ever present in his Church as an energizing force. "This is not only a proof-text for the deity of Christ, but for the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from both Father and Son."—Shedd. Beet also says: "This proves the essential oneness of the Father and the Son."

FOREIGN RÉSUMÉ.

PAUL EWALD, OF LEIPSIC.

THE general drift of thought on the question of the origin of our four gospels has long been toward a sharp separation between the synoptics and the gospel of John. This is often carried to such an extent that if a critic accepts the synoptics as true history he will logically reject the fourth gospel, and vice versâ. The result is that the question of the canonical gospels is a double one. Ewald is one of those who do not regard the differences between the synoptics and John as mutually exclusive. To his mind the latter is the supplement and complement of the others. Having clearly fixed this idea in mind, that there is in reality but one principal gospel problem —that of the relation of the four gospels to each other—he formulates a method which, though not altogether new, is very satisfactory for the solution of the problem. He does not believe that the true solution is found in any of the "tendency" hypotheses. No doctrinal purpose, no exigency of the development of the Church, had control in the selection of the material of the synoptics, as so generally supposed. On the other hand, also, he stoutly resists the idea that the tradition was fixed and that the gospels are simply more or less perfect representations of what the Church had come to believe concerning Christ. Ewald's own theory may be stated as follows, especially with reference to Mark: The gospel of Mark was merely a reduction to writing of the preaching of Peter, for the use of the great apostle's hearers. It was not intended to be a life of Jesus, but simply a record of the things Peter mentioned in his discourses concerning Christ. In a similar way there lies at the foundation of Matthew and Luke a collection of addresses by our Lord, brought together by Matthew. But the three synoptics are one-sided and partial, and therefore, to complete the portrait, the gospel of John was necessary. This reminds us forcibly of what we have always been taught. We cannot resist the conviction, however, that no one cause can be made to account for the present form of our gospels. They were written partly for a purpose, partly from previously written sources, partly from traditional sayings, partly as the utterances of the great apostles, and partly to correct and supplement each other. It is interesting to note that more and more the historical trustworthiness of John's gospel is being emphasized. Ewald is a firm believer in its apostolic origin and in its thorough trustworthiness, as well as in its perfect harmony with the synoptics. The longer the battle rages the more triumphant the victory for the validity of the New Testament record.

JOHANNES GLOËL, OF ERLANGEN.

AMONG the conservative critics of the New Testament Gloël has recently distinguished himself by a tolerably exhaustive and complete refutation of the latest criticism of the Pauline epistles, particularly Galatians, Romans, and First and Second Corinthians. It is the recent attacks of Dutch theologians, followed by the Swiss scholar, Steck, which call forth his cannonade. Steck teaches that the assumption by the followers of the Tübingen school of the Pauline origin of the four principal letters attributed to the great apostle to the heathen is unjustifiable. Neither they nor the others attributed to him can be accepted as Paul's without examination. A critical examination of them, however, leads Steck to the conclusion that they are not of Pauline origin, and, in fact, that we have nothing whatever written by Paul. That this conclusion is justifiable on the principles of the Tübingen school there can be little doubt, although the followers of Baur reject it with tremendous energy. And Steck has done a good service in waking up the newer critical school to the consideration that if the minor epistles must not be accepted without examination the principal ones should not be subjected to a more gentle handling. But his chief service is in having proved that if the methods of some of the critics are to be maintained, then we are deprived of every trustworthy source of information concerning primitive Christianity. Gloël insists further that the pretended literary dependence of Paul's principal letters upon each other and upon other documents of the New Testament is erroneous; and also that we have in the Acts of the Apostles, as Steck admits, trustworthy history, and therefore a twofold source of information, since we can safely trust the Pauline epistles. Gloël deals the radical critics vigorous blows every time he has occasion to speak of their proceedings, and yet he does it with so much authority that they are obliged to take it patiently. He is far from the belief that the Scriptures of the New Testament should not be subjected to a critical examination. But he firmly holds that they cannot be properly investigated by one who knows nothing of the experiences which they reveal as possible to mankind, or who in the process of investigation forgets his personal relation to the Being whom they make known. Without these qualifications criticism is godless and therefore prejudiced. With them it is devout and sympathetic. It is growing more and more evident that the outfit of the biblical critic is not identical with that of the critic of secular history or philosophy. May the number of such as Gloël speedily increase!

PROFESSOR R. F. GRAU.

THE doctrine of inspiration has almost fallen away among the scientific theologians of Germany. Professor Grau's standpoint may be regarded as essentially that of the conservative as against the extreme orthodox and the extreme negative critics. To him the Holy Scriptures are the infallible authority in matters pertaining to faith and salvation. They appear to faith as the divine light of eternal truth and heavenly glory. So they will appear to all the world when He shall come of whom the Scriptures testify. But it pleased God to give this heavenly glory a vestment of humility, in which the dust of the path of centuries through which God has traveled with his people, and the imperfections and errors of men who were the subjects of his covenant, may be recognized. Those who will see nothing of this glory in the Bible, but only these imperfections, shall fall thereby. Those, on the other hand, who, following their own ideas of God's method of dealing with men, fail to see God's way, and refuse to see the imperfections of those men and times, but of imperfections and errors make divine perfections and truths, shall reap the fruit of their course. This is the way of Rome and of papal self-exaltation, which prescribe beforehand what the Bible must contain. It corresponds to a great extent with a standpoint within the Protestant Church. Not the real character of the Bible, but the dogmatic requirements of their own theory, is what they find in Holy Scripture. This is a very convenient pillow for the heads of its believers. They need trouble themselves no more about Scripture. There is nothing more for them to learn, and they can call themselves the only true believers and despise all others. On the other hand, Grau does not believe in an inspiration which reduces the Bible to a human work and makes the divine acts and sacrifices nothing but illusions and human opinions. A critical science reaching such results he rejects. Yet he does not yield the right to employ the science of criticism in reference to the Bible. On the one hand he avoids the self-exaltation which has nothing to learn, and on the other the desperation which sees in the scientific study of the Bible the evidence of apostasy and blasphemy. Faith must maintain itself as well before a world sunken in materialism as before a science which has fallen from the faith. Just because he is certain of his faith without science, and by the power of the Holy Ghost, he will not fear a faithless criticism, and can follow its leadings and thereby discover that even it must serve Jesus Christ as its Lord. It is noticeable that Grau only insists upon the scientific theology as a right, and not upon its utility, which he practically denies by saying that he is sure of his faith without science. This is a striking admission for a scientific theologian.

TRADITION, BY ERNST VON BUNSEN.

This is one of the richest works recently published in Germany. The author undertakes to give an account of the origin and development of tradition. We can select but one small section of the work for treatment here, namely, tradition the original source of the Bible. He regards it as certain that in every ancient nation there were organizations for the purpose of preserving and transmitting traditions. This he thinks was true as well of the ancient Hebrews, and Moses received much of what he wrote from this source. Even as late as Ezra, he thinks, such organizations existed, and Ezra revised some of the sacred writings according to the knowledge thus obtained. To all Scripture thus originated he would deny the quality of revelation. Nevertheless, it is proved to be exceedingly trustworthy. He is convinced that the Book of Deuteronomy in the form in which we have it did not exist prior to the time of Josiah, and that it was written and attributed to Moses by prophets and priests to enhance their standing and to make reformation under Josiah possible. Nevertheless, he does not deny that the valuable facts handed down by tradition from the time of Moses were embodied in the book; and it is highly probable that they employed this opportunity of writing out what had hitherto been in existence only by means of oral tradition. This is certainly a most interesting theory and takes away much of the wickedness of the supposed forgery. Bunsen does not deny the element of revelation in the Bible, but confines it to such parts as might have had their origin in a spiritual communication between God and man. In writing the Holy Scriptures, made up thus partly of traditions carefully sifted and partly of true revelations, the writers could only proceed according to their best knowledge and conscience, and even then they would make mistakes. Evidently, however, Bunsen distinguishes only in degree between other sacred books and the Bible, although the difference in degree is so great as to amount almost to a difference in kind. For he speaks of the Bible as the book of books, and says that it contains more of the word of God than all other sacred writings put together. The impression of a divine power in the Bible makes itself felt among critics of all classes, however much they may differ as to the method of its communication to men. This inner fastness of truth the critics would defend with as much energy as the most orthodox could demand.

THE DYING AND THE SUFFERING MESSIAH OF THE SYNAGOGUE, BY DR. C. H. DALMAN.

THAT during the first millennium of our era subsequent to the separation of Christianity from Judaism there was developed in the latter a doctrine of a Messiah who died a violent death and who made an atonement for the sins of Israel, and that there was also developed during the same period among the Jews a doctrine of justification similar to that of St. Paul's, is significant. Many writers have observed it, as Von Orelli, Schürer, Weber, and Edersheim; but until Dalman published his book there had been no monograph on the subject, and no discriminating treatment of it. Most writers assumed that all the prophecies of the Old Testament which described the sufferings of the Messiah referred to one, and all those which described the glories of the Messiah referred to another, thus giving us two Messiahs with exclusive histories and destinies. This Dalman disputes, and makes the rabbinical teaching refer rather to a Messiah who died—the Messiah, son of Joseph, or the Ephraimite Messiah—and a Messiah who suffered, the Messianic son of David. The former went before the latter. The doctrine of the former, Dalman thinks, did not arise as a parallel to the Samaritan Messiah. He rather regards the origin of the doctrine as a result of the influence of Christianity. The Jews of Jesus's time would not accept our Lord as the Messiah of prophecy. But later they were compelled by the Christian exposition of Jewish Scriptures to look deeper into their prophecies and to find there a suffering Messiah, although they still denied that this was Jesus of Nazareth. But his death was for a different purpose from that of our Lord. It had rather a political significance. The suffering Messiah, on the other hand, grew up out of the interpretation of Isaiah liii. He is represented as having dwelt with Messiah ben Joseph in paradise before his appearance upon earth. It was the suffering Messiah who was supposed to have secured salvation for the people as a reward for his sufferings, which were endured vicariously, as Christianity teaches concerning Christ. But his merit only reached to the Jews, and all who were not circumcised were punished. Furthermore, his merit was only sufficient to supplement the righteousness which they themselves possessed, and did not make them absolutely dependent upon him. The shallowness of the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah stands in pitiful contrast with the profound facts of Christianity. But its existence shows that it is not impossible the complete recognition of the truth by the Jews may sometime come.

PAUL'S LETTER TO THE ROMANS, BY DR. AUGUST EBRARD.

This work by a French Reformed pastor was published subsequent to the death of its gifted author. It consists first of a singularly clear analysis and translation (in German) of the epistle, and second of equally clear notes exegetical and explanatory based on the original text. We shall give here only his general remarks on chapter ix. That God is also the God of the heathen appears in contradiction to his promise that Israel should be his chosen people. There are two methods of solving this problem. One of them is that given in Galatians, the other that found here, where Paul affirms that the promise is not given at all to Israel according to the flesh, but, on the one hand, to a smaller group, namely, the pious remnant of the people, and, on the other hand, according to all the prophets, from Micah to Isaiah onward, to a circle wider than the Jews, namely, the heathen. Of the other entirely different question of the relation of the Holy Spirit to our individual choice or rejection of salvation he makes no mention whatever. He does not even raise the question why the masses of the Jews do not believe; much less does he teach that it is because the Holy Spirit has not given them the requisite assistance. Rather he busies himself here with the question why it is that the masses of Israel have no part in the fulfillment of the promises in Christ. The blame is laid entirely upon the Jew, and not upon the divine will. The idea that Paul is here treating of the relation of the personal choice to the Holy Spirit was brought into the passage by Luther and Calvin from without, namely, from Augustine. Looking through these Augustinian spectacles, these men hoped to find an answer in the text of this chapter. The predestinarians take for the most correct expression of the truth the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, whereas Paul, only for argument's sake, puts this into the mouth of his opponents. It is not the expression of his own opinion. Paul at the most admits that if God saw fit to create some for damnation he has the right to do it; but he nowhere admits that God has so done. In verse 22 he argues directly against the supposition of his opponents by stating what God did really do. We cannot give here even an outline of the logical argument by which the author of this work carries out his exposé of the falsehood of the predestinarian theory. But we quote: "He, therefore, who, out of verse 21, deduces the dogma that God has really created a portion of mankind unto condemnation merely trifles with the Holy Scriptures." This is a hard saying. But it is becoming more and more evidently true as the decades flow on.

MYSTICISM IN MODERN THEOLOGY.

THE energy of theological thought is manifest in the fact that it cannot be checked. Dam it up in front and it will break out on one side and find for itself a new channel. The old rationalism strove to rob the incidents of the Bible of everything irreconcilable with reason. Hindered in its flow in this direction by the demand of an honest exegesis, it turned in another and undertook to destroy the validity of the records themselves. The last work of destruction accomplished, as it supposed, it must needs do something, and so it turns to construction. But it does not construct a new Bible. Rather it finds in the inmost recesses of the inner man the foundation upon which it proposes to build. As external authority in the form of the Bible and the commands of the priesthood passes away the individual rises into prominence, and experience is made the source of authority. Reason is not, as the rationalists taught, the authority and source of our knowledge of things divine. Only as a divinely conferred ability to test experience is reason now held in esteem in the realm of theology. Whereas formerly experience was despised and the possibility of a real religious knowledge almost denied, now it looks as though its triumph had become dangerously complete. It is now solemnly proposed to reconstruct many of the doctrinal utterances of the Bible on experiential grounds. Their presence in the Holy Scriptures could not command acceptance, but experience does. Not the record of the divinity of Christ is supposed to satisfy the mind, but the soul experiences his divine power. That Christ sitteth on the right hand of God is not to be taken on Scripture authority, but that he is risen and living and operative is proved by the soul's communion with him. Indeed, the whole Bible can best be tested by the experiences of the pious soul. These are made not only the proof of the truth of the Bible, but the measure of the divine revelation; whatever cannot be experienced is not revealed. Taking the Bible in its entirety, there are some who, denying the inspiration of individual portions, yet assume to show that every book in our canon is needful as the expression of some truth capable of being tested by experience, and that only these books are needed. This feeling has supplanted with many the authority of reason, revelation, and the Church. This is mysticism pure and simple. But there is really nothing new in the phenomenon. It is impossible for the soul to satisfy itself with negatives. Protestantism fell back upon the authority of the Bible as soon as it renounced the authority of the Church. Negative the authority of the Bible, and the soul must fall back upon itself. This mystical tendency is visible in modern Unitarianism. It denies the essential divinity of Christ but affirms the divinity of every human being. It denies special inspiration to the Bible but attributes inspiration to all high thought. The modern tendency to mysticism often takes fantastic forms. Theosophy is an example. Christianity is too reasonable. The theosophist demands the bizarre speculations which cannot be refuted because they have neither beginning nor end. The mysticism of the present day differs, however, materially from that of ages past. It deals chiefly with authority in matters of faith. It does not press to the extreme the possibilities of enjoyment. It is not lost in contemplation of the being or attributes of God. It is not the kind of mysticism which produces saints. It is purely the mysticism which a reaction from unbelief is sure to carry with it, but held in check by the cold behests of reason. It is the spontaneous effort of the soul to compensate itself for the loss it has sustained in the rejection of the Bible as the source of authority in religion. Accordingly, it is most developed in those who go farthest in biblical criticism. Some such even openly say that our faith is not drawn from the Bible, but would exist just the same without it. Others claim that as the Bible was the product of the Christian consciousness of the earliest Church it can have no authority over us, since we have as good a right to trust the Christian consciousness of our day as they had that of theirs. More radical still is the assertion made by a thoroughly sober as well as able American theologian, that the Christian consciousness of the individual cannot be overpowered by the authority of God's word; in which opinion he is supported by scores of theologians of Europe. Perhaps it is a providential arrangement that when the external supports of faith are taken away the soul can still rely upon its own experiences of divine things. Very certain it is that when all questions now in suspense shall be settled the support of our faith will not be single but manifold. And equally plainly is it revealed by the situation that, as Augustine once said, the soul is made for God, and cannot rest until it rests in him. It may be that some have made faith in the Bible and in dogma so prominent that the soul's rest in God has been endangered. The providence of God will see to it that the soul of the faithful shall return to its rest.

RELIGIOUS AND EDUCATIONAL.

THE APOSTOLICUM ONCE MORE.

The strife continues. So sharp did it become that for a time it threatened other precious interests. The evangelical social congress, in which both Harnack and Stöcker are participants, would have been given up had not both agreed that their controversy should not be carried beyond the domain of theology. On the 16th of November the superior ecclesiastical counselor declared that, while he would not make acceptance of each portion of the Apostles' Creed a test of fitness for entrance into the ministry, he would not tolerate any attempt to do away with the use of the creed in the churches. On the 30th of the same month the assembly of the liberal party of the Church adopted a resolution in which they protested against what they termed the unworthy agitation against the liberal interpretation of the Apostolicum. This they did in the interest of honor and peace. They believed in the freedom of conscience in matters of faith within the Church, and denied that the Apostolicum is a fully justified expression of the evangelical faith. The attempt at coercion was described as savoring too much of Romanism and as dangerous to the love of truth.

A NEWLY DISCOVERED OLD TESTAMENT MANUSCRIPT.

THE manuscripts of the Old Testament now in use do not date back further than the sixth century A. D. But recently a papyrus has been found which contains portions of the prophecies of Zechariah and Malachi. Since it is written in uncials Professor Hechler, of Vienna, places its origin about the third century A. D. Perhaps this is the oldest manuscript of any portion of the Septuagint. It is in a good state of preservation, consists of sixteen leaves written on both sides, each page being 7 by 10 inches. The lines contain from 14 to 17 letters. The leaves are arranged in book form and fastened together with strong parchment thread. The manuscript offers many variations which are advantageous on account of their clearness of expression and grammatical simplicity. Various colors of ink give evidence that the hand of the corrector has been at work.

THE DUEL IN RUSSIA.

THE sentiment against the duel grows rapidly in continental Europe. The latest evidence of this is found in the draft of a new law on the subject prepared by the minister of justice in Russia and laid before the imperial council. It increases the penalties of the old law by extending the period of imprisonment to six years for one who has killed his antagonist in a duel. In case one of the parties is merely wounded and the other remains unhurt the latter is to be imprisoned three years. If both escape uninjured both may be imprisoned six months. It also provides penalties for those who incite and those who witness a duel. This is, perhaps, as far as public sentiment in Russia will go at present. But it indicates progress, and by and by dueling will be prohibited by law, and penalties attached as for murder or assault with intent to kill.

THE BRITISH BIBLE SOCIETY.

DURING the year 1892 this Society distributed nearly four million Bibles in three hundred different languages and dialects. The total number of Bibles distributed since its organization in 1804 is 131,833,769. The Bible Society agents in different lands made interesting reports. In Germany the number of copies sold increased considerably, and a still larger increase is expected in the near future. Yet much remains to be done before the Bible can become the book of the people in Germany. With regard to France the reports complained of the rapid spread of skepticism. In Switzerland there had been a marked increase in the spread of rationalism among the clergy. Favorable reports as to progress were made with reference to the work in Spain, Russia, and Italy. Unfortunately, the Society suffers a deficit of about ten thousand dollars.

EDITORIAL REVIEWS.

SPIRIT OF THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

Browsing, as Charles Lamb might say, among the current Reviews, one recognizes the working in thinking minds of a deep conviction that in the large cities of Christendom the churches are not overcoming the masses of ungodly men. Wickedness, it is thought, is increasing, and in spite of the much that is being done there is still so much left undone that the churches "are losing their influence with the people." This conviction is the root of those radical, novel, and progressive methods of applying Christianity to existing social conditions and needs practiced by the "Salvation Army," the workers in the "Forward Movement," deaconess institutions, etc. These modes of church action are practical confessions that to save the three hundred thousand Germans in this city who are not church members, with the thousands of other neglecters of church services, the Church must work as never before or must wholly lose her power over these classes.

Among suggestions for the achievement of this great object we note in the Missionary Review of the World a proposition by Rev. Dr. E. Judson to endow mission churches. After premising that a local church which "pulls out of the slums to a more congenial environment," and leaves "the huge masses of alien and unevangelical life in the lower parts of our great cities" without the Gospel, "ceases to be essentially Christian," and becomes a "splendid illustration of refined, pious selfishness," he claims that such a church ought to retain its place on the edges of our social swamps, endow its old edifice or erect a new one, see that it has the best kind of preaching, the best music, frequent services, social appliances, a library, reading room, singing schools, day schools, industrial schools, and even day nurseries, etc. To support these he would make the church part of "a revenue-bearing building," requiring of its worshipers to do little more than to support their minister.

Treating of this same question in the Homiletic Review for March, Dr. Richards, of Plainfield, N. J., contends for a return of the churches of to-day to the primitive practice of having but one church in each city for each denomination; thus, for example, all the Presbyterian congregations in New York city should constitute the Presbyterian Church of New York, all the Methodist congregations should become the Methodist Church in New York, etc. Each congregation should have its own officiary and each minister look after his own proper field; but all should be under one central management, work under one plan, and, above all, have but one purse. Thus each denomination would constitute a complete army corps, with all its congregations on a level and all directed to struggle for the common end—the salvation of the entire population.

Dr. Richards reasons that such a return to ancient church methods would result in bringing the full power of the Gospel on the now unsubdued masses of our cities. Lack of space for discussion in this department of the Review forbids comment on these proposed methods of Christian work. They are submitted here, however, as indications of what devout minds are thinking on the great problem of our times—the complete evangelization of our large cities.

THE North American Review for March is rich in papers on questions which deal ably with topics that occupy the thought of the times. The Hon. J. M. Rusk, ex-Secretary of Agriculture, gives his somewhat optimistic conception of what "American farming" will be "a hundred years hence;" Lorrin A. Thurston, ex-Prime Minister of Hawaii, contends that the safety of our Pacific coast and the pecuniary interests of our people require the annexation of the Sandwich Islands. The morality and the probable political consequences of that measure he does not discuss. His views of the question can scarcely be accepted as broad and statesmanlike. Following his paper is a condensed but apparently conclusive and legal answer to the question, "Is it (the annexation of Hawaii) Constitutional?" by George Ticknor Curtis, which ought at least to dispose our government to "look before it leaps" into a relation that substitutes "manifest destiny" for our Constitution. Dr. C. Edson follows Mr. Curtis with a suggestive paper on "Fads of Medical Men," which hits off the follies of both physicians and patients. A lively sketch of George Sand, as she appeared when on a trip from Paris to the Belgian frontier in 1868–69, is the topic of the next article. Then we have a symposium in which the presidents of four leading life insurance companies intelligently and instructively expound the principles of "Modern Insurance and Its Possibilities." "Conceptions of a Future Life," by Archdeacon Farrar, is the title of the succeeding paper, which contends with much force of thought and beauty of style that it is "not unaided nature" that teaches the immortality of the soul, but "the voice of God in the soul of man." It is only by faith then men can look "behind the veil!" Following this we have "Spain at the World's Fair;" "High Buildings and Earthquakes," by Professor N. S. Shaler; the "Claims to Statehood" made by New Mexico and Arizona; "England in the Orient," by Professor Vambéry. "National Banking and the Clearing House," by Hon. A. B. Hepburn, and "Notes and Comments" complete a most excellent number of this deservedly popular Review.

THE New World for March has: 1. "The Place of the Fourth Gospel in the New Testament Literature;" 2. "The Folk-Song of Israel in the Mouth of the Prophets;" 3. "Cosmopolitan Religion;" 4. "The Alleged Socialism of the Prophets;" 5. "Whittier's Spiritual Career;" 6. "The Personal Factor in Biblical Inspiration;" 7. "Israel in Egypt;" 8. "The Briggs Heresy Trial." In the first of these papers Orello Cone, by a process of negative criticism, concludes that the fourth gospel is not the work of the apostle John, but of an unknown writer representing "the Christianized Alexandrianism" of the second century. This "destructive" theory is built upon utterly groundless assumptions. The second article, by Karl Budde, illustrates with fine literary ability the fact that the prophets very freely used the beautiful imagery of the Hebrew mourning and bridal songs for the purpose of giving emphasis to their divine messages to the people. In the third paper C. A. Bartol makes light of opinions and creeds, claiming that salvation consists of "the internal virtues of faith, hope, and love, . . . leaving every mind to decide for itself what to have faith in, what to hope for, and what, with liberty, to love!" Obviously, such religion can be little else than a fanciful castle in the air. The fourth paper is a scathing review of M. Renan's History of the People of Israel, effectually disproving that writer's theory that the Hebrew prophets were teachers of socialism. In the fifth paper J. W. Chadwick traces with a charming pen the moral and spiritual forces which animated and guided the genius of the Quaker poet, whose poems were beautiful expressions of his convictions of the right, the true, and the "Eternal Goodness." Mr. Chadwick is inclined to class Whittier with Unitarian thinkers, but not, as we judge, on valid grounds. The sixth article, by Marvin R. Vincent, is an eloquent presentation of the vexed question of biblical inspiration, claiming that its transcendent quality does not reside in verbal inerrancy or in consistency of minor details, but in the fact that its writers "spake from God as they were borne along by the Holy Spirit." Holding firmly to this fundamental point, the professor is not alarmed by the ultra higher criticism. The seventh paper, by Professor C. H. Toy, treats the Scripture records of the origin of the Jewish nation not as inspired history, but as legends invented by the later thought of the people. The eighth paper is a résumé of the Briggs trial by C. R. Gillett, whose sympathies are with the alleged heretic. Viewed as a whole, this number of the New World sustains both its high literary reputation and its position as an expositor of what professes to be liberal theology and higher criticism.

The Nineteenth Century for March opens with a paper in which Justin McCarthy gives qualified approval to Gladstone's new Home Rule Bill, and predicts its ultimate passage: "The Financial Causes of the French Revolution" are clearly and intelligently stated by Baron Ferdinand Rothschild in its second article. "Architecture—a Profession or an Art" is the topic of its fourth paper, in which T. G. Jackson defines architecture as "nothing else but construction with an artistic motive," condemns the slavishly imitative spirit of modern architects, and contends that "architecture must be studied as a living thing, not as a dead language." Its seventh article, on "Aspects of Tennyson," illustrates the poet's scholarship in a series of critical excerpts from his classical poems. In its eighth paper Miss Clementina Black comments on the prevailing "Dislike to Domestic Service," and suggests that instead of lodging in the family servants be employed day by day for a specified number of hours, as dressmakers and charwomen now are. "Jewish Wit and Humor" is the subject of a racy and entertaining paper by "The Chief Rabbi." In the eleventh article Sir Edmund F. Du Cane proves by a careful analysis of criminal statistics that there is a "Decrease of Crime" in Great Britain. In the twelfth article we have "A Britisher's Impressions of America and Australasia," in which the excellencies and deficiencies of both countries are vividly described with evident intent to be impartial. Yet one easily discerns the influence of the writer's view-point. The thirteenth paper vigorously portrays the ruin which is threatening India through the persistent maintenance of silver as her standard of value. The steady decrease in the gold value of her silver rupee is impoverishing all classes. Gold must be made her standard of value and the silver rupee become a token coin before India can escape the commercial depression which clouds her prospects; at least such is the reasoning of this able article.

THE Andover Review for March–April has: 1. "The Higher Criticism, and its Application to the Bible;" 2. "The Nature of Christ's Authority as a Lawgiver;" 3. "Missions and Civilization;" 4. "Phillips Brooks;" 5. "A Call to Presbyterian Laymen;" 6. "The Andover Band in Maine;" 7. "Morality on a Scientific Basis." Of these papers we note the first as being a luminous exposition of the principles of the higher criticism, defending its necessity, but claiming that its negative and destructive work will be undone or at least greatly modified by a more judicial and constructive application of its principles; we note the second as placing in a strong light the fact that Jesus spoke to man with an authority which was underived, imperative, unreasoned though reasonable, ultimate, and addressed to the conscience as the witness to the truth he proclaimed. The fourth paper is an analysis of the training which gave the theology of Phillips Brooks its peculiar character, and of the mental qualities which made him sui generis as a pulpit orator; the fifth contains a note of warning from a layman to the Presbyterian Church, that in protecting itself from the doctrinal errors involved in the teaching of destructive criticism it needs beware lest in weeding out the tares of rationalism it should also pull out the wheat it cannot afford to lose. In its editorial columns we find a résumé of the case of Professor Smith, and a vivid portraiture of Phillips Brooks, whom it designates "the foremost orator in Christendom."

THE Yale Review for February has: 1. "Comment;" 2. "A New Study of Patrick Henry;" 3. "Ethics as a Political Science;" 4. "A Study of a New England Town;" 5. "Some Recent Aspects of Institutional Study;" 6. "The Crisis of Russian Agriculture." Under the head of "Comment," the questions of "Trades Unions and the Law," "Corruption in France and in America," and "Reasons for Limiting Government Activity" are briefly but suggestively discussed. In the second article William Wirt

Henry's Life of Patrick Henry is strongly commended by Moses Coit Tyler, not as "a banquet of light reading," but as "history for historians," as "biography for biographers," and as a valuable work of reference. Students of ethical science will prize the third paper as illustrating the relation of the Christian precept of love to the comprehension of sound moral principles by the community. To lovers of historical study the fifth paper will be esteemed for the light it casts on the most recent methods of historical study. The sixth paper treats very intelligently of the probable results of the failure of Russian agriculture on the interests of the American farmer. In Russia, it reasons, farms must soon fall into the hands of great capitalists, and her peasants will form a rural proletariat whose cheap labor will compete in the markets of Europe with the American producer. To conquer in this competition the small farms in America will have to be consolidated into vast farms owned and managed by great capitalists. The present race of American small farmers will then disappear. How apparent, if this be sound reasoning, will be the solidarity of human interests!

THE Homiletic Review for March is fully up to its high standard of excellence in all its departments. We note as of special interest a paper from the pen of the late Dr. A. P. Peabody, of Cambridge, Mass., on "The Importance of Personal Character in the Ministry," and an essay by Dr. R. Balgarnie on "The Miracle at Gibeon in the Light of Later Scripture." After conceding the difficulties involved in giving the words of Joshua their literal meaning, Dr. Balgarnie suggests that certain statements in the Bible concerning the miraculous light which irradiated the dwellings of the Jews in the day of Egyptian darkness, which led them through the Red Sea and the wilderness, and which is often referred to by the later prophets, may have shone on the battlefield of Gibeon. Dr. Balgarnie does not claim that it was this divine brightness that helped Joshua to win his victory. He merely suggests that it may have been, and that it was so in the thoughts of the Hebrew prophets. To this interesting suggestion the Scottish verdict "Not proven" is appropriate.

THE Contemporary Review for February has: 1. "The Inadequacy of 'Natural Selection;'" 2. "The Site of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulcher;" 3. "The Military Courage of Royalty;" 4. "The Moral Teaching of Zola;" 5. "Simony;" 6. "Reminiscences of a Journalist;" 7. "The Academic Spirit in Education;" 8. "On a Russian Farm;" 9. "The Limits of Collectivism;" 10. "Count Taaffe and Austrian Politics." Of these papers we note as of special interest or value the first, in which Herbert Spencer claims that Mr. Darwin's use of the phrase "natural selection" has led naturalists to assume that "it can do what artificial selection does," which Spencer denies. The second article, after a thorough sifting of the grounds on which Korte, Robinson, Conder, Haskett Smith, Gordon, and others object to the traditional site of Golgotha, contends that the tradition is historically correct. The Holy Sepulcher stands on the Golgotha of Holy Writ. The seventh paper dissects the "academic person" with a pitiless scalpel; finds him to be afflicted with that superstition which regards "knowledge merely as an end with no regard for the wider issues of life;" and contends for a democratic education which regards learning as having vital relations to every interest of life and trains the student to be also a citizen, a worker, and a man. The eighth paper, by Poultney Bigelow, impressively pictures the almost hopeless poverty and moral degradation of the Russian peasant. The ninth article ably maintains that the drift of modern industrial life is toward its regulation by collective authority, that is, by the State. The "collective will" is to keep both capital and labor within limits which will secure freedom for all. Students of sociology will find the article suggestive reading.

In its March number the Contemporary has a symposium entitled "Notes on the Home Rule Bill," in which Messrs. F. Harrison and J. E. Redmund defend Gladstone's new bill in an apologetic spirit, and Mr. D. Crawford illustrates its feasibility by describing "Home Rule in Croatia" as an analogous case. "Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar" is the title of a very interesting literary paper which finds the key to the purpose of the poet in making "the living Cæsar poor and pale," and causing Cæsar when dead to blaze forth in unrivaled splendor, as in the exclamation of the dying Brutus, "O, Julius Cæsar, thou art mighty yet!" By this Shakespeare meant to teach that when a man's working is ended his work continues in its results. A paper on "The Teacher's Training of Himself" has many practical suggestions which educators may read with profit both to themselves and to their pupils. In "The Holy Catholic Church" the Rev. R. E. Bartlett contends for the visible unity of all believers in Christ, condemns the spirit which perpetuates the separation of churches, and concludes very sensibly that when once "Christians have learned that love is, as Latimer says, 'Christ's livery,' some kind of union will come of itself; but we shall only hinder its coming if we attempt to prescribe the how and the when."

THE Edinburgh Review for January discusses: 1. "The Penury of Russia;" 2. "Life of John Ericsson;" 3. "The Pilgrims of Palestine;" 4. "Sir James Ramsay's Lancaster and York;" 5. "Color Blindness;" 6. "The Dropmore Papers;" 7. "Life and Works of Dr. Arbuthnot;" 8. "The Alchemists of Egypt and Greece;" 9. "The Agricultural Crisis;" 10. "The Great Irish Conspiracy." Of these articles we note the first, which, deriving its facts from authentic documents, sums up the condition of Russia in the statement that "it has a starving people, an exhausted exchequer, and a colossal military expenditure. . . . The life of the czar is insecure, and he has no ally on whom he can depend." The second paper favorably reviews Mr. William Conant Church's life of the great engineer whose armor-clad Monitor contributed so largely to the issue of our conflict in the war of the rebellion. The third paper reviews the "Publications of the Palestine Pilgrim Text Society," which for eight years past has been issuing translations of manuscripts which record histories of the pilgrimages from Christian countries to Palestine from A. D. 326 to A. D. 1291. These papers, says this reviewer, "contain a strange story of human hopes, aspirations, beliefs, fears, follies, superstitions, courage, and faith." The fourth paper commends Sir James Ramsay's book as supplying what has long been a desideratum in English history. The seventh article reviews the life of a distinguished physician and writer who was a conspicuous member of the literary coterie which met at Pope's home in Twickenham. He was intimate with Swift, Gay, Bolingbroke, Peterborough, Chesterfield, Congreve, Parnell, and with other leading minds of his time. Hence his correspondence has both literary interest and historical value. "Johnson thought he was the first man among them, a universal genius and a man of much humor."

THE Catholic World for February is designated the "Golden Jubilee Number," and has among its embellishments portraits of Leo XIII and Francis Satolli, his delegate to the Catholic Church in the United States. Among its papers we note a sketch of the late "Cardinal Lavigerie," whom it designates "the new St. Paul," because of his missionary labors in Africa. "The Home Rule Bill," from which John J. O'Shea expects great results for Ireland, is also treated. Then we have "An Educational Bureau and Journal" described, in which F. M. Edselas pleads earnestly for a central distinctly Catholic organization, with auxiliaries in every diocese, to be represented through "a first-class educational journal," and aiming at a broader culture of Catholic teachers and the multiplication of Catholic schools as means of "reforming (that is, Romanizing) our republic on the basis of the old!" "A People's Ransom" is the title of another paper, in which Henry Charles Kent describes and enthusiastically commends "The Guild of Our Lady of Ransom," which was organized in England some six years ago by Philip Fletcher, a pervert from the English Protestant Church, for the purpose of redeeming "victims of that terrible evil, the Reformation!" Regarding Protestants as spiritual slaves, this guild proposes to ransom them "by prayer, by masses, by work, by charity, by the press, . . . and by obtaining for them the grace which alone can redeem them." Mr. Kent urges American Catholics to enter upon this work of ransoming Americans from the chains of heresy. He is assuredly a very sanguine gentleman, as are other contributors to this able but sadly mistaken magazine. Assuredly there is a new jubilant and expectant activity in the Romanism of to-day which ought to quicken the zeal of evangelical Churches, stirring them to more persistent and energetic efforts to lead Romanists away from that spectacular ritualism which captivates the imagination but cannot save the soul.

THE Methodist Magazine for March opens with an illustrated paper by its editor on "What Egypt Can Teach Us." Its second article summarizes the events of the "Peary Expedition." Other papers follow, making an attractive number of this most excellent family magazine.——The Wes- leyan Methodist Magazine (London) for February has among its weightiest papers, "The Gospel and Revelation of St. Peter;" "Notes on Current Science," by Dallinger; "Theology in Transition and the Bible in Suspense," and "Lives of the Laureates." Its March issue is also abundantly rich in good things.——The Gospel in all Lands for March treats impressively of various phases of missionary work in Mexico in several illustrated articles. It has also a rich variety of papers adapted to the needs of all to whom missionary work is a theme of inexhaustible interest.——The Missionary Review of the World for March is filled with stirring facts showing that the kingdom of Christ is making glorious conquests in all parts of the earth. Its April number has strong papers on "Brahmanism, Past and Present;" "The Religion of the Japanese Ainu;" "Mexico in the Toils of the Papal Power," etc.——Our Day for March is largely taken up with important statements by John G. Paton, the heroic missionary to the New Hebrides, concerning Christianity among the cannibals of the South Sea Islands, and with Joseph Cook's fine critical analysis of the character and work of the late Phillips Brooks in the prelude to his two hundred and twenty-ninth Boston Monday Lecture, on the 6th of February last. It is adorned with an excellent photogravure of that great and noble-hearted bishop.——The Chinese Recorder and Missionary Journal, a magazine published by the American Presbyterian Mission Press at Shanghai, China, has in its January number a paper on "Learning the Chinese Language," not by the old method of "conning dead rules and the spelling of dead books," but by free conversation with a living teacher. Its suggestions have great value for missionaries to China. Another paper, on "Higher Education in our Mission Schools," by Rev. J. Jackson, of our own Church, is also valuable as showing how a trained and educated body of native workers is to be provided in the future.——The Indian Evangelical Review for January, published at Calcutta, discusses "The Urgency of Missions in the Light of Prophecy;" "Medical Missions in India;" "Testimony of a Brahman Convert for Christ," etc. The grand keynote of the first-named paper is "the evangelization of the world in the present generation." Its writer claims that "we are evidently in the closing generation of the present dispensation." Perhaps so, for the signs of a mighty movement in the Churches of to-day in the direction of missionary labor are apparent; but the time of the end is an undetermined factor to all but the Infinite One. Nevertheless, the Churches cannot be wrong in redoubling their efforts for the triumph of the Lord's kingdom.——The Presbyterian and Reformed Review for April presents as its opening article an elaborate discussion of "The Real Problem of Inspiration," by Professor Benjamin F. Warfield, of Princeton. According to the writer this problem, "in its deepest essence," is "whether we can still trust the Bible as a guide in doctrine, as a teacher of truth." Other valuable papers in the same number of the Review discuss "Hypo-Evangelism," "Luther's Doctrine of Inspiration," "The Conflict in Germany over the Apostles' Creed," "James Russell Lowell as a Prose Writer," and "External Evidence as to Seneca's Writings and Paul's."

BOOKS: CRITIQUES AND NOTICES.

THE HEART QUALITY IN LITERATURE.

The address of the best books is to the sensibilities as well as to the intellect of the reader. Both characteristics are requisite. Without the merit of accurate scholarship, in these days of research, a new volume has no charm for the thoughtful reader; without the quality of appeal to the deep emotions of the soul the same book falls short of its possible influence. True writing springs from the deeps of personal experience. "Look into thy heart and write" is a maxim that the author who helps humanity must observe. His book, in the natural order of events, will not fall inert and dead. Carlyle, in his philosophic conception of this truth, has well said: "If a book comes from the heart it will continue to reach the hearts of others." It is probably not incorrect to infer that all of the volumes noticed in our present issue make their appeal to the heart as well as to the head. But of them all we are particularly constrained to recommend the following: The Bible in the World's Education, by H. W. Warren; Manual of Natural Theology, by G. P. Fisher; Greek Poets in English Verse, by W. H. Appleton; and History of the United States, from the Compromise of 1850, by J. F. Rhodes.

RELIGION, THEOLOGY, AND BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

The Bible in the World's Education. By HENRY WHITE WARREN, S.T.D., one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church. 12mo, pp. 320. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.

Whoever has cracked open a geode has an enabling start toward imagining our intellectual sensations on opening this book. For transparent clearness, sharpness, firmness, and symmetrical many-sidedness its pages affect the mind as a nest of crystals does the eye. Bishop Warren has crowned "his many and distinguished services to the University of Denver" by devising a professorship of the English Bible, proposed and offered to the trustees in the following words: "There is one book that is the oldest history, the best-known classic, the deepest philosophy, an ideal excellence of poetry and rhetoric, the embodiment of our American constitutional law, the foundation of good morals, whose words are still spirit and still alive with the authority of Him who spake as never man spake, a blessedness to nations and power of eternal life to individuals. I count myself most happy to be able to begin the endowment of a professorship for teaching all the students of the university, in all the coming years, the varied excellence and perpetual power of the English Bible." With these words went his personal gift of $6,300 toward the endowment necessary to support the professorship. Following upon this, the bishop, as was every way most fit, delivered the first annual course of lectures about the Bible, on what is called the Wyclif Foundation, the lectures being now re-delivered to the whole English-speaking world through the volume before us. It is not strange that the same eagerness for the word of God which caused three million copies of the Revised Version of the New Testament to be called for in a few days after its issue reaches after such books as this, in which the transcendent and exhaustless greatness of the word is set forth with masterful ability and in fascinating style. We understand that a large anticipatory demand welcomed Bishop Warren's volume, and promises to call for many editions. The book itself is an illustration and an effect of the power of the Holy Scriptures, when studied, loved, and lived upon, to uplift, enlarge, and enable the human mind, bringing all faculties to their harmonious best, and, by divine reduplications and intensifications, raising manhood to its highest power. The author enters upon his work with joy superb, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, and, passing the last milestone of his course of thought, comes to the goal aglow with triumph and buoyant as ever, with that sustained and rational optimism which Christianity alone makes possible to sane, intelligent, and cultivated minds. He is a mountain climber who reaches and looks off from the highest peaks of thought to the widest horizons of human vision, and sees on the one hand all truth and fact, and on the other all falsehood and unreality, by the effulgent shining of the Sun of righteousness, the Light of the world. In this volume there is the ease of power; the reader is aware of the push and stroke which go with the determined earnestness of a sturdy nature, and hears the resonant voice of a robust spiritual life. In all the eleven chapters there is not one word of cant or antiquated expression. The eternal truth is freshly phrased in most unhackneyed presentation. The hostile critics of the Bible are tossed into the air as lightly as a juggler plays with his balls. This glowing book, by the one bishop of our Church known to be most at home with the physical sciences, and in many of them a lifelong student and enthusiastic teacher, is enough to refute the frequently declared notion that science and poetry are naturally and necessarily inimical. The alleged decadence of poetry in our land and time, if it be a fact, must be accounted for on some other theory. On every page lies the proof that the scientific and the poetic spirit can coexist in high perfection in the same mind, and can also cooperate in the study and exposition of the message of divine revelation. We are reminded of Emerson's remark that "the vine which bears the most intoxicating fruit is the most mathematical of plants." For all the expectations of faith and for all the joy of the Lord cherished in human souls there is a scientific basis of indestructible solidity. The lily-work of Scripture and of Bishop Warren's lectures is carved upon the capitals of strong pillars of stone and brass. This glad book is able to communicate its reasoned confidence to those who may have been depressed and darkened by the clamor and confusion of many tongues in the loud debate in which scholarship and ignorance, bitter foes and earnest friends, some wise and some foolish, have engaged about the Bible. We prescribe it as a tonic for the ague of anxiety and the fever of fear. Its force is not in form, but in life; it does not frame set syllogisms, but darts convictions through and through the whole moral and intellectual nature. It is lit with that faith which makes existence, to him who has it, an eternal morning, and its strong reasoning is saturated with the spirit out of which songs and shoutings are made. The roll of doxologies is heard above all the paths where science walks or human thought proceeds. Twenty years ago Dr. Whedon, commenting on a book of travel-letters entitled Sights and Insights, wrote, "Dr. Warren is a masterly elephant hunter." The volume of which we now write shows how God's written word can make a man at home and at ease in the loftiest altitudes and farthest ranges of reality, familiar with the greatest themes as a keeper who strokes his lions and calls them all by name.

The Gospel of Paul. By Dr. CHARLES CARROLL EVERETT, Professor of Theology in Harvard University and Dean of the Harvard Divinity School. 12mo, pp. 306. New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, $1.50.

This book offers a new interpretation of Paul's doctrine of the atonement, which, the author claims, is based wholly upon an examination of the words of Paul, taken in their most natural and direct signification. The notion that Christ in his death bore vicariously the penalty of the world's sin is rejected as having no foundation in the teachings of Paul, but resting chiefly upon erroneous views of ancient sacrifice. The substitutionary view is declared to be irreconcilable with the apostle's language. Professor Everett does not accept the Socinian and other rationalistic interpretations of the writings of Paul, the results of which he considers to be "unhappily, for the most part, very vague, and neither very Pauline nor very rational;" but he believes that Christendom will ultimately be compelled by an unprejudiced study of Paul's epistles to adopt the view presented in the pages of his book, although he anticipates that the traditional theory of vicariously punitive sacrifice will be slow to retire. The author says that by this new interpretation the doctrine of salvation through Christ does not suffer; the cross of Christ still remains the instrument by which Christianity gains possession of the world, the symbol of victory through shame, and the source of spiritual life to the world; the crucifixion is of undiminished interest, because by that particular form of death Christ won the victory which brought his Gospel to the Gentile world, presaging final and complete victory over all the powers of evil. The author's conception of the personality of the apostle whose writings he interprets is that Paul was a man of fiery emotions which were wholly under the guidance of his intellect. "Perhaps there was never a man of so passionate a nature who was so absolutely controlled by his reason; and perhaps there was never another instance of so complete a change as Paul underwent" in his conversion from Judaism to Christianity. His life was henceforth based, not upon the authority of the law, but upon "the impulses of a heart transformed by the influence of Jesus and of the Holy Ghost." Dr. Everett expresses his estimate of our indebtedness to Paul by saying that it was he who gave Christianity to the world, and that but for him it would have remained only a Jewish sect, if indeed it had not entirely perished from the earth. Through the medium of Paul's preaching and writing the teachings of Jesus ceased to be provincial and became universal. It is claimed by the author that, in the light of his new interpretation of Paul, the Sermon on the Mount, the parable of the prodigal son, the Lord's Prayer, and many of Christ's other teachings have an intelligibility and beauty such as they cannot have under the old traditional doctrine which made the divine forgiveness impossible without an infinite sacrifice for sin. How far this interesting book is true is capable of long debate. It is, as it purports, a sincere, as well as scholarly, attempt at biblical theology approached from the Unitarian standpoint. Its author honestly endeavors to follow that method of interpretation which primarily and habitually asks, not what we should expect, but what the writer actually says. Yet the exegete or theologian who is able to interpret the Bible without the slightest bias from preconceptions is, in any school or church, what the Latins called a rare bird. The volume before us illustrates the rarity of absolutely judicial poise. The author affirms in his conclusion that, to Paul, Christ was never God: "Paul did not exalt Christ to the deity," although "he did invest him with a superhuman and preexistent glory by which he stood beneath God alone." The opinion most emphasized in the latter part of the volume is that, by the dialectic of Paul, the teaching of Jesus was given, without substantial change, a world-wide influence, being so set free from local forms of thought as to appeal to the universal consciousness of man.

Gloria Patri; or, Our Talks About the Trinity. By JAMES MORRIS WHITON, Ph.D. 16mo, pp. 162. New York: Thomas Whittaker. Price, $1.

This book is worthy of attention, not because of its elucidation of the doctrine of the Trinity, but because of its departure from the well-understood faith of Christendom on that and other important doctrines. Using the terms of the Nicene Creed and giving them a meaning entirely foreign to the thought of its framers, as though words were made only to juggle with, the author evolves a doctrine which is anything but that of the Trinity and which the body of his Congregational brethren will not recognize, however much a small faction may be in accord with him. The Trinity of the Creed is internal to the divine nature; Dr. Whiton's is external, consisting in manifestations and activities, and is properly a duality rather than a trinity. Assuming the identity in substance of all spiritual natures, divine, angelic, and human, he finds no difficulty with the homoousios of the Nicene fathers, for "the race is spiritually of one substance with the Father." He plumply denies the existence of two natures in Christ; and, indeed, if the human soul were of the same essence with God, man would be self-existent, of the same power and eternity with God, and would be God. The incarnation, he holds, was not the union of the divine and human in Jesus, nor was it peculiar to him; for, confounding incarnation with spiritual indwelling, he claims that there have been many incarnations of God in men, though only in Christ was it perfect as it has been in no other.

clearly follows, as Dr. Lyman Abbott puts it, that the divinity of Christ differs from that of Paul "in respect to the endowment and development of being, not in respect to its essential basis or substratum." Christ is Son of God, as all men are, but he is the Son preeminently because in him the moral nature of God fully dwelt. That the Logos became flesh perplexes Dr. Whiton; but he insists on God in man instead of God and man. According to him the Holy Spirit is not a distinct person, but simply an expression of God. Nor does the emphasis which he puts upon the divine immanence save his cause, for, though his school seems to think it peculiarly expressive, it is the common doctrine of orthodoxy. Dr. Whiton rejects the idea of a revelation coming directly from God. Revelation, he teaches, comes not from above, but is developed within the human soul by inward intuition of divine truth, evolutionary and progressive. This confessedly allows many crudities in the Scriptures and must be very full of comfort to advocates of their errancy. The atonement, he tells us, is a reparation to "the divine Spirit in the sinner's breast," and so is "not a governmental work outside of us, but an educational work within us." On the question of post-mortem probation he teaches that God dwells in the sinner's conscience, and redemption is possible at any point of the vast future before conscience becomes extinct. These views, Dr. Whiton thinks, logically follow from what he terms the broader conceptions of the Trinity which he with his friends, Drs. Hedge and Martineau, accept. They promise light, but they give only darkness.

Manual of Natural Theology. By GEORGE PARK FISHER, D.D., LL.D. 16mo, pp. 94. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

This little book is uniform with and a companion to the author's Manual of Christian Evidences, published five years ago, and adds itself to a list of ten important volumes previously furnished by the same distinguished scholar. It is doubtful if the work herein attempted could conceivably have been better done. To condense a great subject into brief statement without essential omission or serious disproportion is difficult and requires more skill and power than does amplification. In this book the great doctrines treated do not lose clearness, coherency, or symmetry by reduction into a compass of less than one hundred pages. Compact, it is yet in its measure complete, and admirably fitted to be a clear and intelligible introduction to the study of natural theology from which the student can proceed through a lifetime to all the expansions and particulars involved in the range of so vast a subject. The seven chapters contain the following themes: "The Nature and Origin of Religion;" "The Cosmological Argument for the Being of God;" "The Argument of Design;" "The Moral Argument;" "The Intuition of the Infinite and Absolute;" "Antitheistic Theories;" "The Future Life of the Soul;" the volume ending with a brief note on "The Ontological Argument." Materialism, pantheism, positivism, and agnosticism are antitheistic. Immortality is confirmed to the reason by the soul's capacity for progress, by the incompleteness of God's moral government here, by the evident or probable probationary character of life, and by man's capacity for fellowship with God. The largest space is given to the "Argument of Design," which is presented in full view of modern scientific doctrines and in a form adjusted in harmony therewith, clearly showing that evolutionary teachings, as given by naturalists of highest repute, serve to fortify rather than weaken the argument of design, making the universe appear at once more wonderful in itself and more certainly divine in its origin. In this, as in the author's larger volumes, there is that fine and easy handling of the materials of argument which denotes the master, and also such ability in the presentation and defense of religious truth as is possible only to exact and comprehensive learning abreast of to-day and ready for to-morrow.

Suggestions for the Study of the English New Testament. By CHARLES HORSWELL, Ph.D. Small 8vo, pp. 24. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, 30 cents.

In his introductory words Dr. Horswell well intimates that New Testament exegesis is not free from difficulties. To the fact that the language, age, and surroundings of its authors differed from our own must be added the further embarrassment that the nineteen centuries of Christian history have given rise to a "mass of literature, whose colossal magnitude daily increases." For the relief of the student who is conscious of these difficulties our author has laid down certain elementary rules in the pursuit of English New Testament study which are scholarly and pertinent. Under the caption of "Method in General" he mentions among other things its importance; under "Method in Detail," he shows the value of the analytic, comparative, and constructive processes; while under "Method Illustrated" he furnishes two elaborate charts of grammatical analysis, with their explanation, which should inspire the student to similar efforts with other portions of the Scripture. The author's enumeration of various volumes which may help in the study of New Testament words, books, topics, and history is not least valuable among his excellent directions. For its clear analysis, its practical character, and its thorough grasp of the situation the pamphlet is to be commended. Our bishops have well directed its use as a book of reference in connection with the Course of Study followed by our itinerant preachers.

Moses, the Servant of God. By F. B. MEYER, B.A., Author of Abraham; or, The Obedience of Faith, etc. 12mo, pp. 190. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Price, cloth, $1.

The humanity of the great leaders of the Scripture must ever be borne in mind in the study of their lives. They were not superhuman. Tribulations, diseases, and death were their heritage in common with ordinary men. Limitations in intellectual force, in judgment, and in practical application were features in all their lives. Even Moses, who walks in the van of the Old Testament heroes, was no exception to this rule. Nor does Mr. Meyer attempt to portray him as aught else than a fallible and erring mortal. Of his purpose the author is himself the best interpreter.

and of this he declares: "I have tried, therefore, to show that Moses was a man like other men;—with great qualities that needed to be developed and improved; with flaws that veined the pure marble of his character; with deficiencies that had rendered him powerless but for the all-sufficient grace that he learned to appropriate; and that he wrought his life work by the simplicity of his faith, by communion with God, and by becoming a channel through which the divine purpose was achieved." Yet while this biographical study of Mr. Meyer is the study of a man, rather than a demigod, it shows us the humanity of Moses in a new and sometimes vivid setting. Just as each artist finds in a familiar landscape some characteristic that has escaped the observation of others, so the Moses which the present author delineates has his peculiar features of attraction. It follows, without the particular saying, that the entire life record of Moses, from his infancy in Egypt to his death on Pisgah—including not only his years of seclusion, but also his long official service—falls within the scope of this volume. So that we have at once a biographic story which is complete and clear in its delineation of Moses's relation to the forward movement of Jewish history. As one in the series on "Old Testament Heroes" the book has its worthy place.

PHILOSOPHY, SCIENCE, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

Christ Enthroned in the Industrial World. A Discussion of Christianity in Property and Labor. By CHARLES ROADS. 12mo. pp. 287. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.

It would be well if every capitalist, every employer of labor, and every employee could read this book. It will not please the anarchist or socialist—it was not written for such; but they who believe that Christianity should regulate all human relations and control all human affairs will find in it much to help them to a correct understanding of the grave questions concerning property and labor which the activities of the present age have forced upon us. On first thought, as one looks at the greed, the fierce competitions, the adulterated goods, the business lies, and the endless tricks of trade—at the struggle of bulls and bears, and the conflicts between labor and capital, the laborer and the employer, with the manifest and even avowed claim of the former to a right in the property of the latter—it would seem that we are in a world without Christ and a world which very much needs him. Yet a wider view shows us that Christian principles do very largely prevail in the affairs of this world, and the problem is to bring about their universal rule. Our philosophers abound in substitutes for them, but no law of evolution or of human progress that leaves Christ out of the account will establish the reign of righteousness. Mr. Roads's view is that the law of Christian love is the only remedy for existing evils, and its application the only perfect solution of the problems of the time. It is simply the law of strict justice and right, the law of the golden rule. The universal reign of truth and righteousness in all the relations and business of men is predicted in the Scriptures, and it will be realized in the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth. This may seem very far away, but its actual remoteness or nearness turns on the fidelity of Christians in applying to practice the principles of their religion. What its requisitions are, first, upon the Christian workman, and, secondly, upon the Christian employer, is presented at some length in a series of chapters worth perusal and study as well. The ideal is a high one, but there are difficulties in the way, chief of which is the unregenerate, selfish human heart; and this only shows us that before one can enter the kingdom of heaven he must be born again. We are not under the necessity of indorsing all of the reasonings and conclusions of our author upon such points as the law of demand and supply, the supposed partnership of employer and employee, profit sharing, and loaning of money. On these and other questions there is ample room for differences of opinion; but the main principles and discussions of the book cannot fail to commend themselves to the Christian thinker.

Persian Literature, Ancient and Modern. By ELIZABETH A. REED, Member of the Philosophical Society of Great Britain, Member of the International Congress of Orientalists, Author of Hindoo Literature, etc. 12mo, pp. 419. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. Price, cloth, $2.50.

The reader is reminded by this book of the great difficulties which lie in the way of a mastery of the ancient literatures. Not only do the abstruse alphabetical forms and the peculiarities of grammatical construction incident to the oriental tongues serve as hindrances to this result, but much more the archaisms in sentiment and national history which are involved. Thus it is that the ordinary reader is not won by such a facsimile of a portion of the oldest Zend manuscript as is inserted in the volume, and that only an ardent orientalist would undertake its translation and its mastery. And yet the exceeding importance of the ancient literatures as links in the great chain of human history calls for their patient and accurate investigation. So does the past instruct the present; and so do the nations of the world, though widely separated in place and time, grow rich in one another's experiences and counsels. From such a realization of the value of the oriental literatures it is obvious that the records of Persia cannot be omitted. Abundant in its traditions, and ample in its records of national prestige, it has much whereof to instruct the world. This fact seems to have given zest to our author in carefully prepared work. Sweeping over the whole field of Persian literature, "from its early mythology to the time when the rule of priestcraft, combined with political tyranny, seems to have quenched the fire of Persian genius," she has recorded much that the archæologist and philologist will be glad to possess. We may not find it possible to linger in detail over the succeeding chapters of her scholarly work. But under the successive divisions of the "Early Tablets and Mythology," "Period of the Zend-Avesta," and "The Time of the Mohammedan Conquest and the Koran," so much is included that the book seems elaborate and even encyclopedic to the casual reader. That the author has seen fit to consult and quote from such distinguished orientalists as Professor Sayce, Max Muller, and many others, lends to the volume in a sense the sanction of great names. Scholarship has become her debtor. We are persuaded that very much which relates to the Persian literature is here recorded in compact and attractive form.

Greek Poets in English Verse. By Various Translators. Edited with Introduction and Notes, by WILLIAM HYDE APPLETON, Professor of Greek in Swarthmore College. 12mo, pp. 360. New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, $1.50.

Emerson habitually used, by preference, good English translations of works in other languages for the same reason, as he said, that in going to Boston he availed himself of the bridge instead of swimming the Charles River. This volume is not of value to those alone who are unfamiliar with Greek, although to them it renders its greatest service. The skill of the noblest art and finest genius to be found among English poets is seen in these translations. The old Greek wine of Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, Theocritus, and forty others, has been decanted into vessels of modern form and make by the hands of Chapman, Pope, Leigh Hunt, Cowper, Shelley, Byron, Milman, the Brownings, Tennyson, Bryant, Edwin Arnold, and as many more. The wondrous and enormous wealth of Greek poetry is herein sampled by its best. The translations in this volume are all in poetic form, although the editor is of opinion that Homer, certainly, if not others also, is most closely approached and satisfactorily known by the nonclassical reader through the medium of prose versions like those of the "Odyssey" by Messrs. Butcher and Lang, in England, and Professor G. H. Palmer, in America. Professor Appleton's book is intended to give the ordinary English reader a comprehensive view of Greek poetry, the grandeur of the rough-hewn dramas of Æschylus, the perfect finish and tender grace of Sophocles, the extravagant "fun, frolic, and absurdity" of Aristophanes, and the human quality of "sad Electra's poet," Euripides, who, as the author hints, might almost be called the Greek Shakespeare, whom Mrs. Browning characterizes in the well-known lines:

> Our Euripides the human
> With his droppings of warm tears,
> And his touches of things common
> Till they rose to touch the spheres.

The amazing richness and undying splendor of Greek poetry, as well as all "the glory which was Greece" are fairly and finely suggested to the mind by a single sentence of the author's introduction to his book. After giving the bare outline of the "Iliad," and saying that this mere story is not Homer any more than canvas, brush, or paint is the picture, he shows us Homer in the following words: "Apollo descending to earth in the blackness of his wrath; the bright-eyed goddess staying the half-drawn sword of Achilles in the council of the kings; sweet-voiced Nestor pouring forth the story of his youthful prowess; Chryses praying to the archer-god; Olympus trembling with the nod of Zeus; Ulysses staying the runaway Greeks in their race to the ships; the assembled host, reverent before the priest, offering their perfect hecatombs to the immortals; Helen on the walls of Troy entrancing the elders of the city with her divine beauty; Agamemnon sorrowing over the wounded Menelaus; the Greeks with measured tread and silent as one man, marching into battle; Athena arming herself in her fringed ægis whereon sat plumed Terror, Strife, Valor, and the dire Gorgon head; Hector laying off his helmet with its nodding crest to caress his frightened child; the thunderbolt falling before the terrified horses of Diomed; Achilles sitting in the door of his tent delighting his soul with the harp and song, and starting up to receive the envoys of Agamemnon; Hector with the Trojans boarding the ships of the Greeks; Sleep and Death bearing the dead Sarpedon to his native Lycia; the fight over the body of Patroclus; the Trojan host panic-stricken at the shout of Achilles from the trench; Achilles warned by his horse Xanthus; the descent of the gods to battle; Achilles's fearful struggle with the river; the death of Hector; Priam kissing the hand that had slain his son—these are Homer." Professor Appleton advocates the use of English translations in high schools, seminaries, and colleges for giving nonclassical scholars courses of study in the Greek and Latin literature.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND TOPOGRAPHY.

France Under the Regency. With a Review of the Administration of Louis XIV. By JAMES BRECK PERKINS, Author of France Under Richelieu and Mazarin. 12mo, pp. xvii, 603. New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, cloth, $2.

The history of France in the eighteenth century so naturally divides itself into epochs that Mr. Perkins prefers a separate treatment of its several periods, intending to discuss each by itself. A previous volume treated of the times of Richelieu and Mazarin. But in selecting the regency of the Duke of Orleans during the eight years' minority of Louis XV as the subject of the present volume, to ascertain the causes of the French Revolution the author finds it necessary to review the administration of Louis XIV, in order to understand the system of government which he perfected and the condition of the country at the expiration of his reign of seventy years. At the death of Mazarin, France was the most powerful State in Europe. Prosperity, both internal and external, marked the first years of the new king's rule. A halo, though much tarnished, still surrounds his age because of its wealth, its architecture, its industry and commerce, and its institutions of learning and art. But it was unfortunate that the king's vanity led him to believe the great things accomplished by his minister to have been really his own work, for his resolution on the cardinal's death to be thenceforth his own minister involved him in many calamities and brought many troubles upon the kingdom. His ambition carried him into useless and expensive wars; his extravagance piled up millions of debt; his superstitious bigotry led to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the persecution of the Huguenots, the dragonnades, and the flight from France of large numbers of her best people. His war upon the feudal privileges of the nobles only tended to the absoluteness of the monarchy, though to this there was no objection on the part of the people. The time had not come when they supposed themselves to possess any rights other than those which the king was pleased to allow. Even the Parliament had meekly come to be simply a registrar of the royal decrees. Louis died without regret, and his obsequies received little respect or attention. By the will of Louis XIV the regency was committed to a council with the Duke of Orleans at the head, but by promises to the Parliament of the restoration of its former powers, which he soon tried to elude, the duke was speedily declared sole regent of the kingdom. In some respects his administration was worthy of praise. He opened the prisons to a large number of persons held in confinement under lettres de cachet, most of whom were guilty of the crime of erroneous views on the questions in debate between the Jansenists and the Jesuits, such as the infallibility of the pope and the merits of the bull Unigenitus. He thought it better to try to convert Protestants by reason rather than by the methods employed under Louis. The French could criticise their rulers and complain of taxation, but the administration of affairs was the business of government, and they troubled themselves very little about them. The great difficulty of the regent related to finance. His industrial and financial experiments only made matters worse. The reader will find the two chapters narrating the story of the Mississippi Company inaugurated by John Law very interesting history, and instructive as well, in view of some of the financial theories advocated in our own day and country. But intellectual changes had begun. If superstition established the worship of the Sacred Heart, persecution had made more converts to infidelity than to Rome. Voltaire, Rousseau, and Montesquieu began to be heard. While the proceedings and absoluteness of the government did not materially change, the intelligence of the people increased and their condition improved. The Revolution was not the result of greater oppression, increased taxation, or deeper wretchedness, but of the better condition of the people and their discovery that they had rights. Mr. Perkins is a brilliant writer, and his pages show most careful and thorough research, causing, perhaps, in some cases, the reversal of judgments hitherto accepted.

History of the United States, from the Compromise of 1850. By JAMES FORD RHODES. Vol. I, 1850–1854. 8vo, pp. x, 506. Vol. II, 1854–1860. 8vo, ix, 511. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, $5.

The purpose of Mr. Rhodes is to narrate the history of the United States from the introduction into Congress of the Compromise Measures of 1850 to the inauguration of Grover Cleveland as President in 1885, covering a period of thirty-five years. He rightly thinks the period as interesting as that of the great Peloponnesian war for the Greek, or the struggle between the Cavalier and the Puritan for the English. In this period the long contest over slavery was settled and the great questions resulting from the war of the rebellion were disposed of, so far as they could be, by the action of Congress and the President. Benton, Greeley, Wilson, and others, who were actors in the scenes of these important years, have given us invaluable works, but the time is come for an impartial statement of the causes and events of the great struggle. The two volumes before us, extending to the election of Mr. Lincoln, in 1860, are prepared with the utmost care and candor, and we have no doubt that the future volumes will exhibit the same true historic spirit. The Compromise Measures of 1850 were a compromise with slavery, and slavery was the cause of the rebellion. To understand them, one must know the history of the country as it relates to that institution. Mr. Rhodes's opening chapter therefore sets forth the introduction of slavery into the country in the landing of a few Negroes in Virginia, and traces its progress through the early conflict between moral feeling and the love of gain until it claimed to be a righteous and beneficent institution and demanded admission into territory previously consecrated to freedom. In the early days of the republic it was generally recognized as an evil which could not long continue. The Churches bore their testimony against it. The ordinance of 1787 prohibited it forever in the Northwest Territory. The word "slave" was not allowed in the Constitution. The general conviction was that the term would soon become extinct. Virginia and Maryland promised to soon become free. But the invention of the cotton gin, by which one man could do in a day the work of fifty, and the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, opening a new market for slave labor, quickly created a change in popular sentiment at the South. The demand arose for a wider area. The first great struggle between the North and the South was over the admission of Missouri as a slave State. It was objected to because it extended the area of slavery. The Missouri Compromise, admitting the State and prohibiting slavery in the Territories north of 36° 30′, was a Southern measure. It was then the received opinion that Congress had power to prohibit slavery in the Territories. Northern sentiment, while conceding the existence of slavery in the States, was strong against its extension. This sentiment grew in proportion with the manifest purpose of the South to extend it. Mr. Rhodes is certainly mistaken in ascribing to Mr. Garrison the growth of opposition to slavery extension, and also in classing the great body of antislavery men as "Abolitionists." The annexation of Texas and the war with Mexico were in the interest of slavery extension. It demanded California and New Mexico, and threatened secession if the demand was not granted. The Compromise of 1850 admitted free California but enacted the Fugitive Slave Law, the inhuman provisions of which profoundly stirred the Northern conscience and humiliated every Northern free man. Other subjects enter into the history of the period, as the theory of the right of a State to secede from the Union, the nullification troubles, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the Black Warrior affair, the Ostend Manifesto, the efforts to obtain Cuba for an additional slave State, the Nebraska Bill, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise in the interest of the South, violating a solemn compact until then deemed irrevocable, the Dred Scott decision, and the Kansas-Nebraska struggle. It was inevitable that the encroachments of the slave power should be met with intense opposition. Meanwhile other changes were occurring in the South. The reopening of the African slave trade was demanded. The power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the Territories was denied. The carrying of slaves there, as any other property, was claimed as a right, and it was asserted that it was the duty of the government to protect their owners in holding them. This was an entirely new theory. Disunion was threatened in the event of the constitutional election of a Republican to the presidency. Slavery must rule or ruin. The old doctrine was that freedom is national and slavery sectional. But such had been the aggressions of slavery that only one step more was needed to make slavery national and freedom sectional. Over the question the Whig party was destroyed. The Republican Party was formed upon the platform promising no further extension of slavery, and in 1860, as Mr. Rhodes describes, carried the country. This was inevitable unless the free North was ready to bow down to a slaveholding oligarchy and allow it to dominate the nation. This it would not do, and resolved on maintaining its self-respect, whatever might be the consequence. We have not space to say more, and will only commend the book as one that merits a place in every historical library.

Theodor Christlieb, D.D., of Bonn. Memoir by His Widow, and Sermons Translated chiefly by T. L. KINGSBURY, M.A., Canon Non-Residentiary of Salisbury, Vicar of Coombe-Bisset with Homington, and SAMUEL GARRATT, M.A., Hon. Canon of Norwich Cathedral, Vicar of St. Margaret's, Ipswich. 12mo, pp. 452. New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son. Price, cloth, $2.

Measured by many of the standards of judgment by which we are accustomed to estimate men, Theodor Christlieb was no ordinary character. Great in his natural endowment, and disciplined in the rigorous training of university life, he was also great in his influence upon the current German religious thought and upon the lives of many who were permitted to sit under his professional instruction. The present memoir of this good man has a double charm. First the story of his life is told by her who knew him best and, in its felicitous description of the honored service of a German pastor and teacher, affords a picture that is in truth attractive. The second part of the volume gives us some of the translated sermonic work of Christlieb himself; and, next to the actual hearing of this forceful pulpit orator, is the privilege of reading these practical and soul-moving discourses. The impression conveyed by the volume cannot but be that a great leader in the ranks of evangelical German Christianity has fallen. The following commendation of one of his eulogists is not an overstatement: "By the death of Professor Christlieb the University of Bonn has lost one of its ablest professors, the Protestant Church of Germany one of its foremost preachers, the cause of Christian truth one of its most scholarly defenders, and Christian missions throughout the world one of their most zealous and enthusiastic advocates."

And while such words of human praise, however deserved, are naught to him who has passed on to the great reward, if his printed memoir shall be an inspiration to those who yet remain in the field of toil it will not have been issued in vain. All lovers of Christian biography will be benefited in its perusal.

Morocco As It Is. With an Account of Sir Charles Euan-Smith's Recent Visit to Fez. Illustrated. By STEPHEN BONSAL, JR. 12mo, pp. 349. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $2.

A glimpse at human life in the obscure corners of the globe, such as is herein afforded, neither lacks in interest nor in benefit. The fund of information on matters of ethnology, philology, social customs, and religion is thereby greatly increased; while the interdependence of all national life and the ethical relations which inhere between the governments of the world assume a new and vivid proportion. It was on an unusual occasion that Mr. Bonsal made his first visit to Fez, as described in the present volume—this occasion being none other than the expedition of Sir Charles Euan-Smith, K.C.B., to this capital city of Morocco as a messenger from the English court. The latter came to the sultan on the delicate diplomatic mission of proposing the improvement of the commercial relations between Great Britain and Morocco. That the errand of the English messenger was received with the suspicion of a covert aim at aggrandizement on the part of his home government, and that he was forced to depart from Morocco without success, do not detract from the interest of Mr. Bonsal's description. So intelligent is his narrative as a traveler that the reader is necessarily edified therein. In Morocco he discovers a land of such fertility as to hold the possibility of being "the granary of Europe," yet one so trammeled by oriental superstitions, so restricted by jealousy toward the European powers, and so burdened by the cruelties of a heathen civilization, that decadence has already set in and absorption by some of the dominant nations of Europe must follow. Of Mr. Bonsal's second visit to Fez it is not necessary to speak in detail; yet one who wishes to read of the unusual, the romantic, and the hazardous will find them in these present extracts from a tourist's experience.

Annals of New York Methodism. Being a History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the City of New York from A. D. 1866 to A. D. 1890. By SAMUEL A. SEAMAN, A.M. 12mo, pp. 505. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, cloth, $1.50.

It would seem that this particular field in the history of our Church has already been so thoroughly gleaned that no aftermath of value might be gathered. While too little is known of many of the events in the development of metropolitan Methodism, or of the personality of those who participated therein, yet the conviction is now perhaps general that little more may be added to supplement the paucity of our denominational records. Because the growth of New York Methodism is, however, pivotal Mr. Seaman has done well to undertake its review. Certain facts have, moreover, contributed to his success in the pursuit—as, for instance, a lifelong association with the Methodism of New York, the help of personal recollections, access to traditions and documentary records, and that well-earned leisure for the pursuit of his antiquarian researches which follows an honorable career in the itinerant ministry. To tell the story of all that he has here recorded is to write the details relating to the growth, membership, pastoral record, financial and spiritual prosperity of the many churches of New York Methodism, since each has a definite, if necessarily abbreviated, place in the chronological consideration. Having made use of such early documents as the "Old Book," with various other records and church registers, and having resorted also to all printed histories and biographies available, Mr. Seaman has evidently embodied in his volume all that an investigator may "gather relating to the history of Methodism in New York city." Only the earlier Methodists, who belonged to the times of which he writes, might challenge the truthfulness of his records. As we cannot criticise the book from this standpoint we are led to pay tribute to the diligence with which the author has culled from tradition and scattered documents the story of earlier Methodism in the New World metropolis.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Fellowship of Hearts. By MARY FENTON BIGELOW. 12mo, pp. 348. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. Price, $1.

The thoughtful love and the unselfish, helpful spirit in Miss Waring's beautiful hymn, from which the title of this book is taken, are happily illustrated in this charming story. Its purpose is to show how people of widely different lines of thought and life, but with kindly dispositions, may help and bless one another. Thus the weary invalid on her couch of suffering, in her farewells to the son and daughter of her removing pastor, incites them to a pure and lofty life. The dwellers in two parsonages become intimate friends; the ministers, brothers and fellow-workers; and their children, bright, joyous, and good, not only help one another, but unite in works of beneficence and cheer. Gradually the circle enlarges, not repelling the uncongenial but eagerly welcoming the earnest soul, whether rich or poor, well instructed or ignorant, that desires a better manhood or womanhood. Out of such fellowship of hearts come, as might be expected, some grand results in the building of character and also in the work of subsequent life. The book is well written, and the narrative so easy and pleasant that the reader never wearies. It was prepared for our young people, and to them we heartily commend it.

Life and Labors of Elijah H. Pilcher, of Michigan, Fifty-nine Years a Minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Edited by his son, JAMES E. PILCHER, M.D. 12mo, pp. 142. New York: Hunt & Eaton.

To the ever-increasing list of her glorified heroes Methodism can add few names more worthy than that of Elijah H. Pilcher. He was well born, so far as Revolutionary ancestry goes; he was well disciplined to industry and hardihood by his youthful experiences upon the Western frontier;

he was well trained for his conspicuous ministerial service by two years of collegiate instruction in the Ohio University before his long itinerant ministry began. The story of his life is another of the romances in Methodist biography. His sterling qualities, which shone forth in times of test, his successes in the establishment of our Church in Michigan, his unusual zeal for scholarship, his well-won honors, and his sunny old age are successive features in this record which win the attention of the reader. One cannot follow the biography without feeling new impulses to nobility. The writer has done well in giving to the Church at large this tribute to so useful and honored a father.

Pulpit Bible Reading. A Study in Vocal Exegesis; or, The Art of Sacred Reading. By the Rev. JAMES T. DOCKINGS, S.T.B., with Introductory Chapters by C. WESLEY EMERSON, M.D., LL.D., President of the Emerson College of Oratory, Boston, and Professor J. W. CHURCHILL, A.M., of the Andover Theological Seminary. Reading, Pa.: Frank J. Boyer. Paper.

In this little pamphlet of sixty pages the author has presented some very valuable suggestions in a hitherto almost neglected field—the art of correctly reading the sacred Scriptures. His conclusion indicates the lines of thought which he has pursued: "Intelligent reading plus sympathetic reading equals effective reading. . . . There should be life to inspire, force to impress, warmth to inflame, and grace to attract. There should be a living sense of the divine presence, an unlimited benevolence, a vivid imagination, great responsiveness, great simplicity of manner and character, purity of soul, a sense . . . of the value of the human soul, and that the Bible is the word of God to that soul." It were well if the pamphlet could be read and reread by every minister.

Along New England Roads. By W. C. PRIME, LL.D., Author of I Go A-Fishing, etc., 16mo, pp. 200. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, cloth, $1.

Various papers contributed to a New York daily newspaper by their well-known author are here gathered into book form. New Hampshire and Vermont are the particular scenes of his description. It is enough to say that the many sketches are written in Dr. Prime's most sparkling and instructive vein. All who love New England as the spot of their nativity will particularly treasure these glimpses at the familiar scenes, and in the awakened memories will find a tender pleasure.

The Picturesque Ohio. A Historical Monograph. Columbian Edition. By C. M. CLARK. 8vo, pp. 238. Cincinnati: Cranston & Curts. New York: Hunt & Eaton. Price, cloth, 90 cents.

Many of the romantic or tragical incidents accompanying the settlement of the territory bordering on the Ohio have been grouped by Mr. Clark in the present monograph. The personality and work of Robert René Cavelier, the discoverer of the Ohio; the contest of the French and English for the possession of this section; and the establishment of the early settlements, with some of the blood-curdling stories of Indian assault, are included in the author's treatment. In this Columbian year of retrospect the book is timely and should "stimulate Christian patriotism."

LIVING PAPERS.

"A whole library on the evidences of Christianity," is what the Journal & Messenger calls these splendid volumes, because they contain the very conclusions of the ripest modern scholarship on living topics of to-day bearing CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES, DOCTRINES, and ETHICS.

IT IS A PEOPLE'S LIBRARY.

The whole plan of the work makes its valuable contents available to all readers. The array of scholarship represented in its list of authors will captivate the theologian and the preacher, the intelligent layman, now coming to the front as never before to consider and act upon all questions touching the life and progress of the kingdom of God, but with comparatively little leisure for study, will find these volumes of special interest and value to him.

FIVE POINTS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO THE LAY READER.

1st. Condensation of Thought. The sixty papers will average about sixty pages each, putting within this brief compass what theological students have hitherto been compelled to delve through great folios to acquire.

2d. Size of Volumes. The volumes are only 7½x5 inches in size and three quarters of one inch in thickness. They are thus of convenient size to carry in the hand, or slow away in any small hand bag for reading on the road, or while going to and from business.

3d. Style of Binding. The volumes are plainly but very neatly and substantially bound. They will not soil easily, and can be carried anywhere without being damaged.

4th. Arrangement of Matter. Each paper is preceded by a short analysis of the argument which it contains, while full marginal references wonderfully assist the mind to follow the writer and fully grasp his thought. Each paper is complete in itself, so that the complete argument can be covered in one brief reading.

5th. Price of Set. Last, but not least by any means, the price is such as to bring this invaluable library of Christian thought within the reach of all.

10 Volumes! 60 Complete Papers! Nearly 4,000 Pages for only $10.

The March of Methodism

By JAMES McGEE.

"'With my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands.' So Jacob, and so might say nineteenth-century Methodism. What a wonderful tale is this story of its journeyings! Men will never weary telling it over. In this book a layman takes up the task. It is not a narrative of incidents so much as an orderly, succinct book tracing the development of a great religious movement. It will aid in familiarizing people with the prominent features of our Church history. It is specially commended to members of the Epworth League."—Pacific Christian Advocate.
